Sen. Grassley has been pushing this for years. I'm not familiar with the particulars of any current legislation, but I'll call Scott.

Subject: inquiry from Media Affairs

Do any of you have any knowledge about Senator Grassley legislation to allow camera into federal courtrooms?

Scott Stanzel from Media Affairs could use some insight on this - 456-5688.

Please let me know if you are going to respond to this....

If not no reply necessary.

Thank you.

US Holds Up Release of Reagan Papers

by DEB RIECHMANN
Associated Press Writer

WASHINGTON (AP) -- The Bush administration is holding up release of 68,000 pages of presidential records that offer an insider's view of how decisions were made in the Reagan White House.

The confidential memos, letters and briefing papers passed among Ronald Reagan and his top advisers were to have come out in January -- 12 years after Reagan left office, as established by post-Watergate laws.

But the White House counsel's office asked the National Archives to delay the release until at least June 21 so government lawyers can look at the files that researchers and others are waiting to dig through.

White House officials say the Reagan documents are the first that would have been released under a presidential records law passed in 1978. They say care must be taken to make sure it's done right.

Historians, on the other hand, say they think President Bush is worried about what some of his top aides might have written when they worked for Reagan in the 1980s.

''I think what Bush is doing is protecting the people who were in the Reagan administration and his father's administration who are still around,'' said American University historian Anna Nelson. ''I think this is part of that everlasting fear that somebody did something in the past that they can't remember. I think they're trying to protect their own people.''

Secretary of State Colin Powell was on Reagan's national security team. Budget Director Mitchell Daniels Jr. was Reagan's political director. Chief White House economist Lawrence Lindsey was on Reagan's Council of Economic Advisers. Many others, including White House chief of staff Andrew Card, Interior Secretary Gale Norton and Ken Dam, nominated for the No. 2 job at Treasury, all worked for Reagan. And of course Reagan's vice president was George Herbert Walker Bush, the president's father.

''Some of these people are veterans from the Reagan administration, and they don't want the documents seen,'' said Vanderbilt University history professor Hugh Graham. ''They don't know what's in there, so they're worried.''

Anne Womack, assistant White House press secretary, denied allegations that the president is trying to protect his aides.

''We've asked for a short extension in order for the documents to undergo a legal review at the Justice Department,'' she said. ''The extension was requested to ensure that the Presidential Records Act is implemented correctly. We are setting precedent for future administrations. It's important that we address all the relevant issues.''

The Presidential Records Act of 1978 followed Watergate and former President Nixon's attempt to hold on to his papers and tape recordings. Nixon said they were personal property. The act made presidential records government property, beginning with Reagan's. The records are stored at the Ronald Reagan Presidential Library in Simi Valley, Calif.

The law also put a 12-year hold on a category of records containing ''confidential communications requesting or submitting advice between the president and his advisers, or between such advisers.''

That 12 years is already up for these Reagan papers. And the documents can no longer be kept under wraps by provisions in either the Presidential Records Act or the Freedom of Information Act.

But before these kind of records are opened, the National Archives is required to give the incumbent president a heads-up. In late February, the National Archives gave Bush the required 30-day notification. At the end of the 30 days, the White House asked for an extension until June 21.

Most records received by the National Archives are more than 30 years old, but presidential records are retrieved from the White House right after a president leaves office, said Sharon Fawcett, a top presidential library official at the National Archives.

''So 12 years later, people are still in office, still active in government and playing significant roles,'' she said. ''But it's not only the people, it's also the issues that are still ongoing concerns -- like missile defense.''

It's unclear whether the documents will be released after June 21.

Nelson and others worry the Bush administration wants to find a way to keep the Reagan documents sealed, or it is looking for ways to put more restrictions on how and when presidential papers can be opened. The 12-year hold on similar papers from former President Bush's administration expires in 2005 -- the year Bush could be starting a second term.

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE

For the week of

June 11, 2001

I. Key Agency News

Office of the Deputy Attorney General (DAG)

- McVeigh Execution: The execution of convicted Oklahoma City bomber Timothy McVeigh is scheduled for Monday, June 11th at 7am (CST) in Terre Haute, IN. On Wednesday, June 6th, in Denver, CO, Judge Richard Matsch denied McVeigh's petition for a stay of execution. The McVeigh execution is the first federal execution in 38 years.

- Garza Execution: Convicted drug kingpin Juan Raul Garza is scheduled to be executed on Tuesday, June 19th. Former President Clinton delayed Garza's execution, originally scheduled for the fall of 2000.

Office of the Solicitor General (OSG)

- Solicitor to Respond to Terry Nichols Request for New Trial: By July 4, per the Supreme Court's June 4th invitation, the Solicitor will file a response to the petition for rehearing of the order denying a writ of certiorari in Nichols v. United States. Petitioner, currently serving a life sentence for his involvement in the Oklahoma City bombing, seeks a new trial alleging that he was prejudiced by the government's improper withholding of potentially exculpatory evidence in FBI files. His original petition for a writ of certiorari was denied, and he now seeks rehearing in light of the recent discovery of several thousand documents related to the bombing investigation that were not turned over to defense counsel during discovery.

- Supreme Court Grants Cert in Challenge to Chicago Permit Requirement: The Department is determining whether participation in the case of Thomas v. Chicago Park District is warranted at this stage. The Department has not participated in the case to date. On May 29, the Court granted a petition for a writ of certiorari in this case, which involves a First Amendment challenge to a Chicago Park District ordinance that requires a permit for any event in a city park that involves more than 50 people or utilizes amplified sound.

- Supreme Court to Review Ninth Circuit's Application of Test for Reasonable Suspicion: On June 4, the Court granted the United States' petition for a writ of certiorari in United States v. Arvizu, No. 00-1519. The questions presented: (1) whether the court of appeals erroneously departed from the totality of the circumstances test that governs reasonable suspicion determinations under the Fourth Amendment by holding that particular facts observed by a law enforcement officer were entitled to no weight and could not be considered as a matter of law; and (2) whether, under the totality of the circumstances test, the Border Patrol agent in this case had reasonable suspicion that justified a stop of a vehicle near the Mexican border. In the petition for a writ of certiorari, the Department contended that the Ninth Circuit's decision in this case departed fundamentally from the Supreme Court's totality-of-the-circumstances test for determining whether reasonable suspicion exists. By declaring as a matter of law that law enforcement officers may not consider certain facts when forming a suspicion of illegal activity, the court of appeals created a direct conflict with decisions of the Supreme Court and other courts of appeals and incorrectly excluded critical evidence in this case.

Office of Legislative Affairs (OLA)

- Ira Einhorn Extradition: The House Government Reform Subcommittee on Criminal Justice, Drug Policy and Human Resources has scheduled a hearing on "Justice Delayed: Extradition and the Ira Einhorn Case" on June 7. The Department met with Subcommittee staff on May 22, and met with the family of the victim on June 6. Criminal Division Deputy Assistant Attorney General Bruce Swartz will testify.

Civil Rights Division (CRT)

- Update on Pattern or Practice Investigation of Cincinnati Police Department: The Division is continuing its pattern or practice investigation of the Cincinnati Police Division's use of deadly and non-deadly force by conducting additional meetings with City and police officials, as well as members of the community, and reviewing relevant documents. On May 7, the Attorney General announced that the Civil Rights division would be conducting a pattern or practice investigation of the CPD's use of deadly and non-deadly force. The Attorney General also committed to provide the City and the Police Division with expert technical assistance on how to best reform their policing practices if needed. On May 23-25, the Division conducted the initial rounds of interviews in its use of force investigation of the CPD.

Civil Division (CIV)

- Ninth Circuit To Hear Oral Argument On June 11 In Tort Case Arising Out Of The Transborder Apprehension Of Plaintiff By The DEA: On June 11, the Ninth Circuit will hear oral argument on whether the transborder apprehension of Humberto Alvarez-Machain supports a false arrest/false imprisonment tort claim and whether it was an actionable violation of international law under the Alien Tort Statute. Plaintiff is a Mexican doctor that U.S. officials believe was involved in the murder of Drug Enforcement Administration (DEA) Agent Enrique Camarena-Salazar. Plaintiff was abducted from Mexico by DEA-paid Mexican nationals and brought to the United States so that he could be charged with the murder. At trial, plaintiff was acquitted. He then commenced this suit against the United States, five DEA officials and one member of the Mexican abduction team. The District Court held the agents and the United States immune from plaintiff's claims. Plaintiff appealed. The issues presented on appeal include: whether plaintiff's claim that his apprehension violated international law supports a claim under the Alien Tort Statute; whether the apprehension was authorized by federal law and or CA law; and whether plaintiff's tort claims fall within the foreign country exception of the Federal Tort Claims Act.

Criminal Division (CRM)

- U.S. Files Plea Agreement in Bush Videotape Case: It is anticipated that a plea will be scheduled for June 8 in Austin, TX, in the case of a former office manager and receptionist for the Bush 2000 campaign's chief media consultant. On May 25, in the W.D. TX, a plea agreement was reached with the defendent, who was indicted in March on charges stemming from her release from the Bush-Cheney 2000 presidential campaign of a video tape and documents relating to then-Governor Bush's preparations for the presidential debates. The defendant has agreed to plead guilty to mail fraud and perjury counts in the pending indictments.

- Denaturalization Trial of Accused Nazi: The trial in the N.D. OH of the Government's denaturalization case against John Demjanjuk is expected to go into its third and final week the week of June 11th. The trial commenced on May 29th. Demjanjuk's 1988 conviction in Israel on charges of murders committed while serving as a brutal guard at the Nazis' Treblinka Death Camp known to inmates as "Ivan the Terrible" was reversed by the Israeli Supreme Court in 1993. Demjanjuk's naturalized U.S. citizenship, which had been revoked in 1981 following a denaturalization trial in federal district court in Cleveland, was restored by N.D. OH in February 1998 in the wake of judicial findings that federal prosecutors had committed fraud on the court by withholding exculpatory information from the defendant during the original denaturalization proceedings. A new denaturalization action was filed against Demjanjuk in May 1999 by the Office of Special Investigations (OSI) and the U.S. Attorney's Office in Cleveland, based on Demjanjuk's service as an armed guard at the Sobibor death camp and other Nazi camps in wartime Poland and Germany.

Executive Office for United States Attorneys (EOUSA)

- Interim United States Attorneys to Attend Seminar: Training will be held for interim United States Attorneys June 7-8, in Columbia, SC. The purpose of the training is to discuss their new leadership roles. Topics will include an overview of the Department's initiatives; media and legislative trends; budget and resources; and leadership and coordination as United States Attorneys. The Attorney General is expected to address the group.

Office of Justice Programs (OJP)

- From June 11-15 in Auorora, CO, the Office of Juvenile Justice and Delinquency Prevention is sponsoring, together with Fox Valley Technical College and the National Center for Missing and Exploited Children, a conference regarding "Protecting Children Online."

II. Press Activity

- Multiple media outlets will run stories on the expected execution of Timothy McVeigh, scheduled for Monday, June 11th.

- Several media outlets will run stories on the judicial nominations as the hearings start.

- The NY Times will run a story on National Instant Criminal (background check) System (NICS) record retention by Fox Butterfield (weekend of June 9th). They will suggest that the Justice Department is bending to the political whims of the NRA by striking down a rule implemented in the last days of the Reno administration relating to the retention of records for Brady background checks. DOJ is currently "conducting a comprehensive review" of the program and may make substantial changes to it following that review.

- 48 Hours/CBS may be breaking a story based out of Seattle that alleges that the FBI failed to disclose documents in the case of US v. Nickell (No. CR87-276WD, W.D. Washington). Nickell was convicted in 1987 for murdering her husband and is serving a life sentence. All appeals have expired.

- USA Today is working on a story about settlement talks that are underway between the United States and the National Ass'n. of Homebuilders. The NAHB filed suit over federal wetlands protection regulations.

Brett and I just had lunch with Laurel Pressler, Mike Dewine's Chief of Staff. She is a person who may be quite helpful to us going forward with confirmation issues. She's eager to make your acquaintance and plans to call you soon. Brett and I recommend you take her call and make a little time to establish a relationship.

Pool Report
June 12, 2001
Madrid and Los Yebenes, Spain

The following is an excerpt from the pooler's upcoming novel, "The Longest Pool." DON'T wait for the movie. (if you are on deadline, cut immediately to the end where the pool had a very brief Q&A with Ari)

We join the POTUS at Barajas International Airport in Madrid, where is disembarks AF1 wearing a dark suit, white shirt and light blue tie that is by now familiar to all of you. Following him on the stairs are Secretary of State Colin Powell, Chief of Staff Andrew Card and National Security Adviser Condeleezza Rice, and an assortment of flaks and aides (models of which are available for purchase in the Flaks and Aides shop in the lobby).

The motorcade motored along M-40 to the Zarzuela Palace. It was most uneventful. Some of the people whose cars were stopped on highway entrance ramps to make way for the POTUS stood beside their cars and watched in a world-weary way that at 50 mph can be describe only as studied nonchalance. No one waved, but no one made obscene gestures either.

When we arrived at the palace, your pooler was diverted to a point on the grounds where he would pose a threat to no one but himself. All details of POTUS meeting with the King and Queen will come from the pre-positioned pool.

The motorcade departed the royal grounds a half-hour behind schedule owing to the longer-than-expected meeting between the POTUS, FLOTUS, King and Queen. (And, yes, a POTUS and FLOTUS do beat a King and Queen in both draw and stud poker.)

The motorcade from the palace to the Cuatro Vientos Air Base was uneventful.

The 50-minute helicopter ride to Los Quintos de Mora (known to POTUS as "The Ranch") was uneventful. Locals say the grounds are located in the town of Los Yebenes.

(A brief aside: The Spanish do not call this place a "ranch" and seem to have a hard time understanding why POTUS does. It is actually a nature preserve. Like there's a difference, right?)

Marine 1 made its usual discreet landing next to the home of Prime Minister Jose Maria Aznar, blowing trees, small animals and two still photographers into the next county.

(A note for the stylistically uncertain: It is proper and acceptable, according to locals, for western press to refer to President Aznar as Prime Minister Aznar. He is an appointed president and head of government. The King is head of state.)

POTUS exited Marine 1 sans tie and suit jacket. His white dress shirt was open at the collar, but his french cuffs remained cinched by presidential cuff links. PM Aznar walked to Marine 1 wearing a similar get-up: Open collared white dress shirt and dark suit pants without jacket or tie. PE's shirt cuffs were rolled up slightly, however, as if to say we Spaniards have much to teach you Americans about dressy-casual attire!

POTUS introduced PE Aznar to Powell. A few minutes later, he introduced Rice and Card to PE Aznar.

As they walked the grounds in front of the PE's residence, the two men posed before a statue of a good-sized stag. (Much will be read into this image in the years to come; your pooler leaves this powerful image unadorned by his unworthy words.)

The two men, who share a conservative streak and a perchance for rural living, strolled for a few minutes so that they could watch the cameramen and photogs stumble over each other trying to keep up. It was all good fun.

As they walked, PE Aznar would occasionally take POTUS by the elbow and point out features of interest. Judging by the few words your pooler was able to hear as photogs stomped him into the ground, the two men were speaking in Spanish.

The two men strolled into the residence for their meeting. The extended bilateral included Powell, Rice, Card, Heather Hodges, deputy chief of mission here and Dan Fried (pronounced Freed) of the National Security Council. Their Spanish counterparts were also present, but White House aides on the scene did not have a complete list of names and spellings.

This just in from the ubiquitous Gordon Johndroe: After the meeting, the group adjourned to lunch, which included Gespatcho with lobster, cured ham and chesse, paellaya with local fowl, hake (a type of fish) and strawberry ice cake with berries for dessert.

After lunch, the group met again.

The helicopters departed 4:20 p.m. Trip was uneventful.

The motorcade back to the palace for press avail. was uneventful.

ARI Q&A
Ari joined us the pool briefly in our holding area.

Asked about a wire report that two bombs had been found in Madrid on Monday, Ari indicated that they posed no threat to - and may have been unrelated to - POTUS visit. The Secret Service, which normally keeps him apprised of potential threats, issued no such alert in relation the bomb.

Asked about reports of sabotage in Sweden, Ari said he would check with the Secret Service.

Asked about the protestors at the American embassy and whether they were disruptive, Ari said: "Protestors at international summits these day are a modern way of life. Hold a summit and the protestors show up. That won't keep the president from getting his work done."

Ari noted that Clinton and other presidents drew their share of protestors ofver the years. That's not necessarily a reflection on public attituide towared their policies, he said. Many are protesting on much broader issues or issues the president is not taking up directly, such as globalization.

Asked if the White House had heard any immediate reaction from Europe on its Climate Change plan, Ari called the president's plan "a very helpful affirmation of what the president stands for - addressing global warming without being alarmists and without hurting the U.S. economy."

Asked if European nations were being disingenuous in their criticisms of Bush for rejecting the Kyoto agreement since many of them are better off without it, Ari said, "None of the Eurpoean nations voted to ratify Kyoto and that speaks volumes."

The two men, who share a conservative streak and a perchance for rural living, strolled for a few minutes so that they could watch the cameramen and photogs stumble over each other trying to keep up. It was all good fun.

As they walked, PE Aznar would occasionally take POTUS by the elbow and point out features of interest. Judging by the few words your pooler was able to hear as photogs stomped him into the ground, the two men were speaking in Spanish.

The two men strolled into the residence for their meeting. The extended bilateral included Powell, Rice, Card, Heather Hodges, deputy chief of mission here and Dan Fried (pronounced Freed) of the National Security Council. Their Spanish counterparts were also present, but White House aides on the scene did not have a complete list of names and spellings.

This just in from the ubiquitous Gordon Johndroe: After the meeting, the group adjourned to lunch, which included Gespatcho with lobster, cured ham and chesse, paellaya with local fowl, hake (a type of fish) and strawberry ice cake with berries for dessert.

After lunch, the group met again.

The helicopters departed 4:20 p.m. Trip was uneventful.

The motorcade back to the palace for press avail. was uneventful.

ARI Q&A
Ari joined us the pool briefly in our holding area.

Asked about a wire report that two bombs had been found in Madrid on Monday, Ari indicated that they posed no threat to - and may have been unrelated to - POTUS visit. The Secret Service, which normally keeps him apprised of potential threats, issued no such alert in relation the bomb.

Asked about reports of sabotage in Sweden, Ari said he would check with the Secret Service.

Asked about the protestors at the American embassy and whether they were disruptive, Ari said: "Protestors at international summits these day are a modern way of life. Hold a summit and the protestors show up. That won't keep the president from getting his work done."

Ari noted that Clinton and other presidents drew their share of protestors ofver the years. That's not necessarily a reflection on public attituide towared their policies, he said. Many are protesting on much broader issues or issues the president is not taking up directly, such as globalization.

Asked if the White House had heard any immediate reaction from Europe on its Climate Change plan, Ari called the president's plan "a very helpful affirmation of what the president stands for - addressing global warming without being alarmists and without hurting the U.S. economy."

Asked if European nations were being disingenuous in their criticisms of Bush for rejecting the Kyoto agreement since many of them are better off without it, Ari said, "None of the Eurpoean nations voted to ratify Kyoto and that speaks volumes."

Pool Report
June 12, 2001
Madrid and Los Yebenes, Spain

The following is an excerpt from the pooler's upcoming novel, "The Longest Pool." DON'T wait for the movie. (if you are on deadline, cut immediately to the end where the pool had a very brief Q&A with Ari)

We join the POTUS at Barajas International Airport in Madrid, where is disembarks AF1 wearing a dark suit, white shirt and light blue tie that is by now familiar to all of you. Following him on the stairs are Secretary of State Colin Powell, Chief of Staff Andrew Card and National Security Adviser Condeleezza Rice, and an assortment of flaks and aides (models of which are available for purchase in the Flaks and Aides shop in the lobby).

The motorcade motored along M-40 to the Zarzuela Palace. It was most uneventful. Some of the people whose cars were stopped on highway entrance ramps to make way for the POTUS stood beside their cars and watched in a world-weary way that at 50 mph can be describe only as studied nonchalance. No one waved, but no one made obscene gestures either.

When we arrived at the palace, your pooler was diverted to a point on the grounds where he would pose a threat to no one but himself. All details of POTUS meeting with the King and Queen will come from the pre-positioned pool.

The motorcade departed the royal grounds a half-hour behind schedule owing to the longer-than-expected meeting between the POTUS, FLOTUS, King and Queen. (And, yes, a POTUS and FLOTUS do beat a King and Queen in both draw and stud poker.)

The motorcade from the palace to the Cuatro Vientos Air Base was uneventful.

The 50-minute helicopter ride to Los Quintos de Mora (known to POTUS as "The Ranch") was uneventful. Locals say the grounds are located in the town of Los Yebenes.

(A brief aside: The Spanish do not call this place a "ranch" and seem to have a hard time understanding why POTUS does. It is actually a nature preserve. Like there's a difference, right?)

Marine 1 made its usual discreet landing next to the home of Prime Minister Jose Maria Aznar, blowing trees, small animals and two still photographers into the next county.

(A note for the stylistically uncertain: It is proper and acceptable, according to locals, for western press to refer to President Aznar as Prime Minister Aznar. He is an appointed president and head of government. The King is head of state.)

POTUS exited Marine 1 sans tie and suit jacket. His white dress shirt was open at the collar, but his french cuffs remained cinched by presidential cuff links. PM Aznar walked to Marine 1 wearing a similar get-up: Open collared white dress shirt and dark suit pants without jacket or tie. PE's shirt cuffs were rolled up slightly, however, as if to say we Spaniards have much to teach you Americans about dressy-casual attire!

POTUS introduced PE Aznar to Powell. A few minutes later, he introduced Rice and Card to PE Aznar.

As they walked the grounds in front of the PE's residence, the two men posed before a statue of a good-sized stag. (Much will be read into this image in the years to come; your pooler leaves this powerful image unadorned by his unworthy words.)

The two men, who share a conservative streak and a perchance for rural living, strolled for a few minutes so that they could watch the cameramen and photogs stumble over each other trying to keep up. It was all good fun.

STATEMENT OF
THE OFFICE OF TAX POLICY
DEPARTMENT OF THE TREASURY
BEFORE THE SUBCOMMITTEE ON SELECT REVENUE MEASURES COMMITTEE ON WAYS AND MEANS

Mr Chairman, Mr. McNulty, and Members of the Subcommittee:

The Office of Tax Policy appreciates the opportunity to present testimony on tax incentives to increase domestic production of oil and gas and promote energy conservation. There has been renewed interest in the role of tax incentives in our national energy policy.

The fundamental principle underlying a sound energy policy is that markets should be allowed to function freely and market interventions should be avoided unless justified by compelling energy security, economic, environmental, or other concerns. For example, returns on investments that increase domestic oil and gas reserves may not reflect the contribution of those investments to ensuring stability in supply and thereby reducing our vulnerability to oil supply disruptions. It is the goal of this Administration to pursue an energy policy that protects America=s economic, security, and environmental interests.

Beyond the fundamental issue of whether a tax incentive is justified at all, a number of other, often contradictory, considerations must be taken into account in the design of any particular incentive. For example, incentives should be appropriately targeted to induce desired activities in a cost-effective manner. Thus, incentives should be designed to not reward investments that would have been made in the absence of an incentive. At the same time, however, incentives that are targeted too narrowly may reduce the cost of only some technologies and discourage investment in other promising approaches. This can result in economic inefficiency and will contribute to perceptions that the tax system is being used inappropriately to pick winners and losers among competing technologies.

In addition, incentives should also be designed to minimize complexity and avoid unnecessary increases in taxpayer compliance burdens and IRS administrative costs.

Increasing Domestic Oil and Gas Production

Before turning to a discussion of the present tax treatment of oil and gas activities, we would like to provide a brief overview of this sector.

Overview

Oil is an internationally traded commodity with its domestic price set by world supply and demand. Domestic exploration and production activity is affected by the world price of crude oil. Historically, world oil prices have fluctuated substantially. From 1970 to the early 1980s, there was a fivefold increase in real oil prices. World oil prices fell sharply in 1986 and were relatively more stable from 1986 through 1997. During that period, average refiner acquisition costs ranged from $14.91 to $23.59 in real 1992 dollars. In 1998, however, oil costs to the refiner declined to $12.52 per barrel in nominal dollars ($11.14 per barrel in 1992 dollars), their lowest level in 25 years in real terms. Since 1998, the decline has reversed with refiner acquisition costs (in nominal dollars) rising to $17.51 per barrel in 1999 and $27.69 per barrel in 2000 (the price has since dropped to $24.11 per barrel in March 2001, the latest month for which composite figures are available). The equivalent prices in 1992 dollars are $15.31 per barrel in 1999, $24.28 per barrel in 2000, and $20.39 per barrel in March 2001.

Domestic oil production has been on the decline since the mid-1980s. From 1978 to 1983 oil consumption in the United States also declined, but increasing consumption since 1983 has more than offset this decline. In 2000, domestic oil consumption was 28 percent higher than in 1970. The decline in oil production and increase in consumption have led to an increase in oil imports. Net petroleum (crude and product) imports have risen from approximately 38 percent of consumption in 1988 to 52 percent in 2000.

A similar pattern of large recent price increases and increasing dependence on imports has occurred in the natural gas market. During the second half of the 1990s, spot prices for natural gas exceeded $4.00 per million Btu (MMBtu) in only one month (February 1996). The spot price again exceeded $4.00 per MMBtu in May 2000, rose above $5.00 per MMBtu in September 2000, and exceeded $10.00 per MMBtu for several days last winter. The current spot price is approximately $3.71 per MMBtu.[1]

The United States has large natural gas reserves and was essentially self-sufficient in natural gas until the late 1980s. Since 1986, natural gas consumption has increased by more than 30 percent but natural gas production has increased by only 17 percent. Net imports as a share of consumption nearly quadrupled from 1986 to 2000, rising from 4.2 percent to 15.6 percent. Natural gas from Canada makes up nearly all of the imports into the United States.

Current law tax incentives for oil and gas production

The importance of maintaining a strong domestic energy industry has been long recognized and the Internal Revenue Code includes a variety of measures to stimulate domestic exploration and production. They are generally justified on the ground that they reduce vulnerability to an oil supply disruption through increases in domestic production, reserves, exploration activity, and production capacity. The tax incentives contained in present law address the drop in domestic exploratory drilling that has occurred since the mid-1950s and the continuing loss of production from mature fields and marginal properties.

Incentives for oil and gas production in the form of tax expenditures are estimated to total $9.8 billion for fiscal years 2002 through 2006.[2] They include the nonconventional fuels (i.e., oil produced from shale and tar sands, gas produced from geopressured brine, Devonian shale, coal seams, tight formations, or biomass, and synthetic fuel produced from coal) production credit ($2.4 billion), the enhanced oil recovery credit ($4.4 billion), the allowance of percentage depletion for independent producers and royalty owners, including increased percentage depletion for stripper wells ($2.3 billion), the exception from the passive loss limitation for working interests in oil and gas properties ($100 million), and the expensing of intangible drilling and development costs ($640 million). In addition to those tax expenditures, oil and gas activities have largely been eliminated from the alternative minimum tax. These provisions are described in detail below.

Certain costs incurred prior to drilling an oil- or gas-producing property are recovered through the depletion deduction. These include costs of acquiring the lease or other interest in the property, and geological and geophysical costs (in advance of actual drilling). Any taxpayer having an economic interest in a producing property may use the cost depletion method. Under this method, the basis recovery for a taxable year is proportional to the exhaustion of the property during the year. The cost depletion method does not permit cost recovery deductions that exceed the taxpayer=s basis in the property or that are allowable on an accelerated basis. Thus, the deduction for cost depletion is not generally viewed as a tax incentive.

[2] Analytical Perspectives, Budget of the United States Government, Fiscal Year 2002, U.S. Government Printing Office, Washington, DC, 2001, p. 63. These estimates are measured on an Aoutlay equivalent≅ basis. They show the amount of outlay that would be required to provide the taxpayer the same after-tax income as would be received through the tax preference. This outlay equivalent measure allows a comparison of the cost of the tax expenditure with that of a direct Federal outlay.

Independent producers and royalty owners (as contrasted to integrated oil companies)[3] may qualify for percentage depletion. A qualifying taxpayer determines the depletion deduction for each oil or gas property under both the percentage depletion method and the cost depletion method and deducts the larger of the two amounts. Under the percentage depletion method, generally 15 percent of the taxpayer=s gross income from an oil- or gas-producing property is allowed as a deduction in each taxable year. The amount deducted may not exceed 100 percent of the net income from that property in any year (the Anet-income limitation≅).[4] Additionally, the percentage depletion deduction for all oil and gas properties may not exceed 65 percent of the taxpayer=s overall taxable income (determined before such deduction and adjusted for certain loss carrybacks and trust distributions).[5]

A taxpayer may claim percentage depletion with respect to up to 1,000 barrels of average daily production of domestic crude oil or an equivalent amount of domestic natural gas. For producers of both oil and natural gas, this limitation applies on a combined basis. All production owned by businesses under common control and members of the same family must be aggregated; each group is then treated as one producer for application of the 1,000-barrel limitation.

Special percentage depletion provisions apply to oil and gas production from marginal properties. The statutory percentage depletion rate is increased (from the general rate of 15 percent) by one percentage point for each whole dollar that the average price of crude oil (as determined under the provisions of the nonconventional fuels production credit of section 29) for [3] An independent producer is any producer who is not a Aretailer≅ or Arefiner.≅ A retailer is any person who directly, or through a related person, sells oil or natural gas or any product derived therefrom (1) through any retail outlet operated by the taxpayer or related person, or (2) to any person that is obligated to market or distribute such oil or natural gas (or product derived therefrom) under the name of the taxpayer or the related person, or that has the authority to occupy any retail outlet owned by the taxpayer or a related person. Bulk sales of crude oil and natural gas to commercial or industrial users, and bulk sales of aviation fuel to the Department of Defense, are not treated as retail sales for this purpose. Further, a person is not a retailer within the meaning of this provision if the combined gross receipts of that person and all related persons from the retail sale of oil, natural gas, or any product derived therefrom do not exceed $5 million for the taxable year. A refiner is any person who directly or through a related person engages in the refining of crude oil, but only if such person or related person has a refinery run in excess of 50,000 barrels per day on any day during the taxable year.

[4] By contrast, for any other mineral qualifying for the percentage depletion deduction, the deduction may not exceed 50 percent of the taxpayer=s taxable income from the depletable property.

[5] Amounts disallowed as a result of this rule may be carried forward and deducted in subsequent taxable years, subject to the 65-percent-of-taxable-income limitation for those years.

the immediately preceding calendar year is less than $20 per barrel. In no event may the rate of percentage depletion under this provision exceed 25 percent for any taxable year. The increased rate applies for the taxpayer=s taxable year which immediately follows a calendar year for which the average crude oil price falls below the $20 floor. To illustrate the application of this provision, the average price of a barrel of crude oil for calendar year 1999 was $15.56; thus, the percentage depletion rate for production from marginal wells was increased by four percent (to 19 percent) for taxable years beginning in 2000. The 100-percent-of-net-income limitation has been suspended for marginal wells for taxable years beginning after December 31, 1997, and before January 1, 2002.

Marginal production is defined for this purpose as domestic crude oil or domestic natural gas which is produced during any taxable year from a property which (1) is a stripper well property for the calendar year in which the taxable year begins, or (2) is a property substantially all of the production from which during such calendar year is heavy oil (i.e., oil that has a weighted average gravity of 20 degrees API or less corrected to 60 degrees Fahrenheit). A stripper well property is any oil or gas property for which daily average production per producing oil or gas well is not more than 15 barrel equivalents in the calendar year during which the taxpayer=s taxable year begins.[6] A property qualifies as a stripper well property for a calendar year only if the wells on such property were producing during that period at their maximum efficient rate of flow.

If a taxpayer=s property consists of a partial interest in one or more oil- or gas-producing wells, the determination of whether the property is a stripper well property or a heavy oil property is made with respect to total production from such wells, including the portion of total production attributable to ownership interests other than the taxpayer=s. If the property satisfies the requirements of a stripper well property, then each owner receives the benefits of this provision with respect to its allocable share of the production from the property for its taxable year that begins during the calendar year in which the property so qualifies.

The allowance for percentage depletion on production from marginal oil and gas properties is subject to the 1,000-barrel-per-day limitation discussed above. Unless a taxpayer elects otherwise, marginal production is given priority over other production for purposes of utilization of that limitation.

Because percentage depletion, unlike cost depletion, is computed without regard to the taxpayer=s basis in the depletable property, cumulative depletion deductions may be far greater than the amount expended by the taxpayer to acquire or develop the property. The excess of the percentage depletion deduction over the deduction for cost depletion is generally viewed as a tax expenditure.

Intangible drilling and development costs

In general, costs that benefit future periods must be capitalized and recovered over such periods for income tax purposes, rather than being expensed in the period the costs are incurred. In addition, the uniform capitalization rules require certain direct and indirect costs allocable to property to be included in inventory or capitalized as part of the basis of such property. In general, the uniform capitalization rules apply to real and tangible personal property produced by the taxpayer or acquired for resale.

Special rules apply to intangible drilling and development costs (AIDCs≅).[7] Under these special rules, an operator (i.e., a person who holds a working or operating interest in any tract or parcel of land either as a fee owner or under a lease or any other form of contract granting working or operating rights) who pays or incurs IDCs in the development of an oil or gas property located in the United States may elect either to expense or capitalize those costs. The uniform capitalization rules do not apply to otherwise deductible IDCs.

If a taxpayer elects to expense IDCs, the amount of the IDCs is deductible as an expense in the taxable year the cost is paid or incurred. Generally, IDCs that a taxpayer elects to capitalize may be recovered through depletion or depreciation, as appropriate; or in the case of a nonproductive well (Adry hole≅), the operator may elect to deduct the costs. In the case of an integrated oil company (i.e., a company that engages, either directly or through a related enterprise, in substantial retailing or refining activities) that has elected to expense IDCs, 30 percent of the IDCs on productive wells must be capitalized and amortized over a 60-month

[7] IDCs include all expenditures made by an operator for wages, fuel, repairs, hauling, supplies, etc., incident to and necessary for the drilling of wells and the preparation of wells for the production of oil and gas. In addition, IDCs include the cost to operators of any drilling or development work (excluding amounts payable only out of production or gross or net proceeds from production, if the amounts are depletable income to the recipient, and amounts properly allocable to the cost of depreciable property) done by contractors under any form of contract (including a turnkey contract). Such work includes labor, fuel, repairs, hauling, and supplies which are used in the drilling, shooting, and cleaning of wells; in such clearing of ground, draining, road making, surveying, and geological works as are necessary in preparation for the drilling of wells; and in the construction of such derricks, tanks, pipelines, and other physical structures as are necessary for the drilling of wells and the preparation of wells for the production of oil and gas. Generally, IDCs do not include expenses for items which have a salvage value (such as pipes and casings) or items which are part of the acquisition price of an interest in the property.

A taxpayer that has elected to deduct IDCs may, nevertheless, elect to capitalize and amortize certain IDCs over a 60-month period beginning with the month the expenditure was paid or incurred. This rule applies on an expenditure-by-expenditure basis; that is, for any particular taxable year, a taxpayer may deduct some portion of its IDCs and capitalize the rest under this provision. This allows the taxpayer to reduce or eliminate IDC adjustments or preferences under the alternative minimum tax.

[8] The IRS has ruled that if an integrated oil company ceases to be an integrated oil company, it may not immediately write off the unamortized portion of the IDCs capitalized under this rule, but instead must continue to amortize those IDCs over the 60-month amortization period.

The election to deduct IDCs applies only to those IDCs associated with domestic properties.[9] For this purpose, the United States includes certain wells drilled offshore.[10]

Intangible drilling costs are a major portion of the costs necessary to locate and develop oil and gas reserves. Because the benefits obtained from these expenditures are of value throughout the life of the project, these costs would be capitalized and recovered over the period of production under generally applicable accounting principles. The acceleration of the deduction for IDCs is viewed as a tax expenditure.

Nonconventional fuels production credit

Taxpayers that produce certain qualifying fuels from nonconventional sources are eligible for a tax credit (Athe section 29 credit≅) equal to $3 per barrel or barrel-of-oil equivalent.[11] Fuels qualifying for the credit must be produced domestically from a well drilled, or a facility treated as placed in service before January 1, 1993.[12] The section 29 credit generally is available for qualified fuels sold to unrelated persons before January 1, 2003.[13]

[9] In the case of IDCs paid or incurred with respect to an oil or gas well located outside of the United States, the costs, at the election of the taxpayer, are either (1) included in adjusted basis for purposes of computing the amount of any deduction allowable for cost depletion or (2) capitalized and amortized ratably over a 10-year period beginning with the taxable year such costs were paid or incurred.

[10] The term AUnited States≅ for this purpose includes the seabed and subsoil of those submerged lands that are adjacent to the territorial waters of the United States and over which the United States has exclusive rights, in accordance with international law, with respect to the exploration and exploitation of natural resources (i.e., the Continental Shelf area).

[11] A barrel-of-oil equivalent generally means that amount of the qualifying fuel which has a Btu (British thermal unit) content of 5.8 million.

[12] A facility that produces gas from biomass or produces liquid, gaseous, or solid synthetic fuels from coal (including lignite) generally will be treated as being placed in service before January 1, 1993, if it is placed in service by the taxpayer before July 1, 1998, pursuant to a written binding contract in effect before January 1, 1997. In the case of a facility that produces coke or coke gas, however, this provision applies only if the original use of the facility commences with the taxpayer. Also, the IRS has ruled that production from certain post-1992 Arecompletions≅ of wells that were originally drilled prior to the expiration date of the credit would qualify for the section 29 credit.

[13] If a facility that qualifies for the binding contract rule is originally placed in service after December 31, 1992, production from the facility may qualify for the credit if sold to an unrelated person before January 1, 2008.

For purposes of the credit, qualified fuels include: (1) oil produced from shale and tar sands; (2) gas produced from geopressured brine, Devonian shale, coal seams, a tight formation, or biomass (i.e., any organic material other than oil, natural gas, or coal (or any product thereof); and (3) liquid, gaseous, or solid synthetic fuels produced from coal (including lignite), including such fuels when used as feedstocks. The amount of the credit is determined without regard to any production attributable to a property from which gas from Devonian shale, coal seams, geopressured brine, or a tight formation was produced in marketable quantities before 1980.

The amount of the section 29 credit generally is adjusted by an inflation adjustment factor for the calendar year in which the sale occurs.[14] There is no adjustment for inflation in the case of the credit for sales of natural gas produced from a tight formation. The credit begins to phase out if the annual average unregulated wellhead price per barrel of domestic crude oil exceeds $23.50 multiplied by the inflation adjustment factor.[15]

The amount of the section 29 credit allowable with respect to a project is reduced by any unrecaptured business energy tax credit or enhanced oil recovery credit claimed with respect to such project.

As with most other credits, the section 29 credit may not be used to offset alternative minimum tax liability. Any unused section 29 credit generally may not be carried back or forward to another taxable year; however, a taxpayer receives a credit for prior year minimum tax liability to the extent that a section 29 credit is disallowed as a result of the operation of the alternative minimum tax. The credit is limited to what would have been the regular tax liability but for the alternative minimum tax.

The provision provides a significant tax incentive (currently about $6 per barrel of oil equivalent or $1 per thousand cubic feet of natural gas). Coalbed methane and gas from tight formations currently account for most of the credit.

Enhanced oil recovery credit

Taxpayers are permitted to claim a general business credit, which consists of several different components. One component of the general business credit is the enhanced oil recovery credit. The general business credit for a taxable year may not exceed the excess (if any) of the taxpayer=s net income tax over the greater of (1) the tentative minimum tax, or (2) 25 percent of so much of the taxpayer=s net regular tax liability as exceeds $25,000. Any unused general business credit generally may be carried back one taxable year and carried forward 20 taxable years.

[14] The inflation adjustment factor for the 2000 taxable year was 2.0454. Therefore, the inflation-adjusted amount of the credit for that year was $6.14 per barrel or barrel equivalent.

[15] For 2000, the inflation adjusted threshold for onset of the phaseout was $48.07 ($23.50 x 2.0454) and the average wellhead price for that year was $26.73.

The enhanced oil recovery credit for a taxable year is equal to 15 percent of certain costs attributable to qualified enhanced oil recovery (AEOR≅) projects undertaken by the taxpayer in the United States during the taxable year. To the extent that a credit is allowed for such costs, the taxpayer must reduce the amount otherwise deductible or required to be capitalized and recovered through depreciation, depletion, or amortization, as appropriate, with respect to the costs. A taxpayer may elect not to have the enhanced oil recovery credit apply for a taxable year.

The amount of the enhanced oil recovery credit is reduced in a taxable year following a calendar year during which the annual average unregulated wellhead price per barrel of domestic crude oil exceeds $28 (adjusted for inflation since 1990).[16] In such a case, the credit would be reduced ratably over a $6 phaseout range.

For purposes of the credit, qualified enhanced oil recovery costs include the following costs which are paid or incurred with respect to a qualified EOR project: (1) the cost of tangible property which is an integral part of the project and with respect to which depreciation or amortization is allowable; (2) IDCs that the taxpayer may elect to deduct;[17] and (3) the cost of tertiary injectants with respect to which a deduction is allowable, whether or not chargeable to capital account.

A qualified EOR project means any project that is located within the United States and involves the application (in accordance with sound engineering principles) of one or more qualifying tertiary recovery methods which can reasonably be expected to result in more than an insignificant increase in the amount of crude oil which ultimately will be recovered. The qualifying tertiary recovery methods generally include the following nine methods: miscible fluid displacement, steam-drive injection, microemulsion flooding, in situ combustion, polymer-augmented water flooding, cyclic-steam injection, alkaline flooding, carbonated water flooding, and immiscible non-hydrocarbon gas displacement, or any other method approved by the IRS. In addition, for purposes of the enhanced oil recovery credit, immiscible non-hydrocarbon gas displacement generally is considered a qualifying tertiary recovery method, even if the gas injected is not carbon dioxide.

A project is not considered a qualified EOR project unless the project=s operator submits to the IRS a certification from a petroleum engineer that the project meets the requirements set [16] The average per-barrel price of crude oil for this purpose is determined in the same manner as for purposes of the section 29 credit.

[17] In the case of an integrated oil company, the credit base includes those IDCs which the taxpayer is required to capitalize.

The enhanced oil recovery credit is effective for taxable years beginning after December 31, 1990, with respect to costs paid or incurred in EOR projects begun or significantly expanded after that date.

Conventional oil recovery methods do not recover all of a well=s oil. Some of the remaining oil can be extracted by unconventional methods, but these methods are generally more costly. At current world oil prices, a large part of the remaining oil in place is uneconomic to recover by unconventional methods. In this environment, the EOR credit can increase recoverable reserves. Although recovering oil using EOR methods is more expensive than recovering it using conventional methods, it may be less expensive than producing oil from new reservoirs. Although the credit could phase out at higher oil prices, it is fully effective at present world oil prices.

Alternative minimum tax

A taxpayer is subject to an alternative minimum tax (AAMT≅) to the extent that its tentative minimum tax exceeds its regular income tax liability. A corporate taxpayer=s tentative minimum tax generally equals 20 percent of its alternative minimum taxable income in excess of an exemption amount. (The marginal AMT rate for a noncorporate taxpayer is 26 or 28 percent, depending on the amount of its alternative minimum taxable income above an exemption amount.) Alternative minimum taxable income (AAMTI≅) is the taxpayer=s taxable income increased by certain tax preferences and adjusted by determining the tax treatment of certain items in a manner which negates the deferral of income resulting from the regular tax treatment of those items.

As a general rule, percentage depletion deductions claimed in excess of the basis of the depletable property constitute an item of tax preference in determining the AMT. In addition, the AMTI of a corporation is increased by an amount equal to 75 percent of the amount by which adjusted current earnings (AACE≅) of the corporation exceed AMTI (as determined before this adjustment). In general, ACE means AMTI with additional adjustments that generally follow the rules presently applicable to corporations in computing their earnings and profits. As a general rule a corporation must use the cost depletion method in computing its ACE adjustment. Thus, the difference between a corporation=s percentage depletion deduction (if any) claimed for regular tax purposes and its allowable deduction determined under the cost depletion method is factored into its overall ACE adjustment.

Excess percentage depletion deductions related to crude oil and natural gas production are not items of tax preference for AMT purposes. In addition, corporations that are independent oil and gas producers and royalty owners may determine depletion deductions using the percentage depletion method in computing their ACE adjustments.

The difference between the amount of a taxpayer=s IDC deductions and the amount which would have been currently deductible had IDC=s been capitalized and recovered over a 10-year period may constitute an item of tax preference for the AMT to the extent that this amount exceeds 65 percent of the taxpayer=s net income from oil and gas properties for the taxable year (the Aexcess IDC preference≅). In addition, for purposes of computing a corporation=s ACE adjustment to the AMT, IDCs are capitalized and amortized over the 60-month period beginning with the month in which they are paid or incurred. The preference does not apply if the taxpayer elects to capitalize and amortize IDCs over a 60-month period for regular tax purposes.

IDC=s related to oil and gas wells are generally not taken into account in computing the excess IDC preference of taxpayers that are not integrated oil companies. This treatment does not apply, however, to the extent it would reduce the amount of the taxpayer=s AMTI by more than 40 percent of the amount that the taxpayer=s AMTI would have been if those IDCs had been taken into account.

In addition, for corporations other than integrated oil companies, there is no ACE adjustment for IDCs with respect to oil and gas wells. That is, such a taxpayer is permitted to use its regular tax method of writing off those IDCs for purposes of computing its adjusted current earnings.

Absent these rules, the incentive effect of the special provisions for oil and gas would be reduced for firms subject to the AMT. These rules, however, effectively eliminate AMT concerns for independent producers.

Passive activity loss and credit rules

A taxpayer=s deductions from passive trade or business activities, to the extent they exceed income from all such passive activities of the taxpayer (exclusive of portfolio income), generally may not be deducted against other income.[18] Thus, for example, an individual taxpayer may not deduct losses from a passive activity against income from wages. Losses suspended under this Apassive activity loss≅ limitation are carried forward and treated as deductions from passive activities in the following year, and thus may offset any income from passive activities generated in that later year. Losses from a passive activity may be deducted in full when the taxpayer disposes of its entire interest in that activity to an unrelated party in a transaction in which all realized gain or loss is recognized.

An activity generally is treated as passive if the taxpayer does not materially participate in it. A taxpayer is treated as materially participating in an activity only if the taxpayer is involved in the operations of the activity on a basis which is regular, continuous, and substantial.

A working interest in an oil or gas property generally is not treated as a passive activity, whether or not the taxpayer materially participates in the activities related to that property. This exception from the passive activity rules does not apply if the taxpayer holds the working interest through an entity which limits the liability of the taxpayer with respect to the interest. In addition, if a taxpayer has any loss for any taxable year from a working interest in an oil or gas property which is treated pursuant to this working interest exception as a loss which is not from a passive activity, then any net income from such property (or any property the basis of which is determined in whole or in part by reference to the basis of such property) for any succeeding taxable year is treated as income of the taxpayer which is not from a passive activity.

Similar limitations apply to the utilization of tax credits attributable to passive activities. Thus, for example, the passive activity rules (and, consequently, the oil and gas working interest exception to those rules) apply to the nonconventional fuels production credit and the enhanced oil recovery credit. However, if a taxpayer has net income from a working interest in an oil and gas property which is treated as not arising from a passive activity, then any tax credits attributable to the interest in that property would be treated as credits not from a passive activity (and, thus, not subject to the passive activity credit limitation) to the extent that the amount of the credits does not exceed the regular tax liability which is allocable to such net income.

As a result of this exception from the passive loss limitations, owners of working interests in oil and gas properties may use losses from such interests to offset income from other sources.

Tertiary injectants

Taxpayers are allowed to deduct the cost of qualified tertiary injectant expenses for the taxable year. Qualified tertiary injectant expenses are amounts paid or incurred for any tertiary injectant (other than recoverable hydrocarbon injectants) which is used as a part of a tertiary recovery method.

The provision allowing the deduction for qualified tertiary injectant expenses resolves a disagreement between taxpayers (who considered such costs to be IDCs or operating expenses) and the IRS (which considered such costs to be subject to capitalization).

Energy Efficiency and Alternative Energy Sources

Incentives for energy efficiency and alternative energy sources are also essential elements of national energy policy. The continuing strength of our economy over the past two years, despite oil price rises, underscores the dramatic improvements in energy efficiency we have achieved over the past quarter century, as well as the changing economy. While past oil shortages have taken a significant toll on the U.S. economy, the recent increases in oil prices have not affected the economy much. Increased energy efficiency in cars, homes, and manufacturing has helped insulate the economy from these short-term market fluctuations. In 1974, we consumed 15 barrels of oil for every $10,000 of gross domestic product. Today we consume only 8 barrels of oil for the same amount (in constant dollars) of economic output.

Current law tax incentives for energy efficiency and alternative fuels

Tax incentives currently provide an important element of support for energy-efficiency improvements and increased use of renewable and alternative fuels. Current incentives in the form of tax expenditures are estimated to total $1.2 billion for fiscal years 2002 through 2006. They include a tax credit for electric vehicles and expensing for clean-fuel vehicles ($20 million), a tax credit for the production of electricity from wind or biomass and a tax credit for certain solar energy property ($590 million), and an exclusion from gross income for certain energy conservation subsidies provided by public utilities to their customers ($580 million).[19]

Electric and clean-fuel vehicles and clean-fuel vehicle refueling property

A 10-percent tax credit is provided for the cost of a qualified electric vehicle, up to a maximum credit of $4,000. A qualified electric vehicle is a motor vehicle that is powered primarily by an electric motor drawing current from rechargeable batteries, fuel cells, or other portable sources of electric current, the original use of which commences with the taxpayer, and that is acquired for use by the taxpayer and not for resale. The full amount of the credit is available for purchases prior to 2002. The credit begins to phase down in 2002 and does not apply to vehicles placed in service after 2004.

Certain costs of qualified clean-fuel vehicles and clean-fuel vehicle refueling property may be deducted when such property is placed in service. Qualified electric vehicles do not qualify for the clean-fuel vehicle deduction. The deduction begins to phase down in 2002 and does not apply to property placed in service after 2004.

Energy from wind or biomass

A 1.5-cent-per-kilowatt-hour tax credit is provided for electricity produced from wind, Aclosed-loop≅ biomass (organic material from a plant that is planted exclusively for purposes of being used at a qualified facility to produce electricity), and poultry waste. The electricity must be sold to an unrelated person and the credit is limited to the first 10 years of production. The credit applies only to facilities placed in service before January 1, 2002. The credit amount is indexed for inflation after 1992.

Solar energy

A 10-percent investment tax credit is provided to businesses for qualifying equipment that uses solar energy to generate electricity, to heat or cool or provide hot water for use in a structure, or to provide solar process heat.

Ethanol and renewable source methanol

An income tax credit and an excise tax exemption are provided for ethanol and renewable source methanol used as a fuel. In general, the income tax credit is 53 cents per gallon for ethanol and 60 cents per gallon for renewable source methanol. As an alternative to the income tax credit, gasohol blenders may claim an equivalent gasoline tax exemption for each ethanol and renewable source methanol that is blended into qualifying gasohol.

The income tax credit expires on December 31, 2007, and the excise tax exemption expires on September 30, 2007. In addition, the ethanol credit and exemption are each reduced by 1 cent per gallon in 2003 and by an additional 1 cent per gallon in 2005. Neither the credit nor the exemption apply during any period in which motor fuel taxes dedicated to the Highway Trust Fund are limited to 4.3 cents per gallon. Under current law, the motor fuel tax dedicated to the Highway Trust Fund will be limited to 4.3 cents per gallon beginning on October 1, 2005.

Subsidies provided by public utilities to their customers for the purchase or installation of energy conservation measures are excluded from the customers= gross income. An energy conservation measure is any installation or modification primarily designed to reduce consumption of electricity or natural gas or to improve the management of energy demand with respect to a dwelling unit.

Administration budget proposals

The Administration=s budget proposals for fiscal year 2002 include tax incentives for renewable energy resources. The budget also contains proposals to modify the tax treatment of nuclear decommissioning funds related to electricity production and to extend the suspension of the net income limitation applicable to certain oil and gas production. The Administration=s proposals are described below.[20]

Electricity from wind and biomass

[20] For a more detailed description, see General Explanations of the Administration=s Fiscal Year 2002 Tax Relief Proposals, Department of the Treasury, April 2001.

The Administration proposes to extend the credit for electricity produced from wind and biomass for three years to facilities placed in service before January 1, 2005. In addition, eligible biomass sources would be expanded to include certain biomass from forest-related resources, agricultural sources, and other specified sources. Special rules would apply to biomass facilities placed in service before January 1, 2002. Electricity produced at such facilities from newly eligible sources would be eligible for the credit only from January 1, 2002, through December 31, 2004. The credit for such electricity would be computed at a rate equal to 60 percent of the generally applicable rate. Electricity produced from newly eligible biomass co-fired in coal plants would also be eligible for the credit only from January 1, 2002, through December 31, 2004. The credit for such electricity would be computed at a rate equal to 30 percent of the generally applicable rate.

Residential solar energy systems

The Administration proposes a new tax credit for individuals that purchase solar energy equipment used to generate electricity (photovoltaic equipment) or heat water (solar water heating equipment) for use in a dwelling unit that the individual uses as a residence. The credit would be available only for equipment used exclusively for purposes other than heating swimming pools. The proposed credit would be equal to 15 percent of the cost of the equipment and its installation. The credit would be nonrefundable and an individual would be allowed a lifetime maximum credit of $2,000 per residence for photovoltaic equipment and $2,000 per residence for solar water heating equipment. The credit would apply only to solar water heating equipment placed in service after December 31, 2001, and before January 1, 2006, and to photovoltaic systems placed in service after December 31, 2001, and before January 1, 2008.

Nuclear decommissioning funds

The Administration proposes to repeal the current law provision that limits deductible contributions to a nuclear decommissioning fund to the amount included in the taxpayer=s cost of service for ratemaking purposes. Thus, unregulated taxpayers would be allowed a deduction for amounts contributed to a qualified nuclear decommissioning fund. The Administration also proposes to permit funding of all decommissioning costs (including pre-1984 costs) through qualified nuclear decommissioning funds. Contributions to fund pre-1984 costs would be deductible except to the extent a deduction (other than under the qualified fund rules) or an exclusion from income has been previously allowed with respect to those costs. The Administration=s proposal would clarify that any transfer of a qualified nuclear decommissioning fund in connection with the transfer of the power plant with which it is associated would be nontaxable and no gain or loss will be recognized by the transferor or transferee as a result of the transfer. In addition, the proposal would permit taxpayers to make deductible contributions to a qualified fund after the end of the nuclear power plant=s estimated useful life and would provide that nuclear decommissioning costs are deductible when paid.

Net income limitation on percentage depletion from marginal wells

The Administration proposes a one-year extension of the provision suspending the 100-percent-of-net-income limitation for marginal oil and gas wells. Under the Administration proposal, marginal wells would continue to be exempt from the limitation during taxable years beginning in 2002.

NEPD Group proposals

The Report of the National Energy Policy Development (NEPD) Group issued in May also included tax incentives for renewable energy resources and for more efficient energy use. The NEPD Group proposals are described below.[21]

Fuel from landfill methane

The NEPD Group proposes to extend the section 29 credit for fuel produced from landfill methane produced at a facility (or portion of a facility) that is placed in service after December 31, 2001. Fuel produced at such facilities would be eligible for the credit through December 31, 2010. The proposal would also expand the credit by permitting the credit for fuel used by the taxpayer to produce electricity. The credit for fuel produced at landfills subject to EPA=s 1996 New Source Performance Standards/Emissions Guidelines would be limited to two-thirds of the otherwise applicable amount. In the case of landfills with facilities that currently qualify for the section 29 credit, this limitation would not apply until after 2007.

Ethanol and renewable source methanol

The NEPD Group proposes to extend the income tax credit and excise tax exemption for ethanol and renewable source methanol through December 31, 2010. The current law rule providing that neither the credit nor the exemption apply during any period in which motor fuel taxes dedicated to the Highway Trust Fund are limited to 4.3 cents per gallon would be retained.

Hybrid and fuel cell vehicles

The NEPD Group proposes to provide temporary tax credits for certain hybrid and fuel cell vehicles.

A credit of $250 to $4,000 would be available for purchases of qualifying hybrid vehicles after December 31, 2001, and before January 1, 2008. A hybrid vehicle is a vehicle that draws propulsion from both an on-board internal combustion or heat engine using combustible fuel and an on-board rechargeable energy storage system. To qualify for the minimum credit, a hybrid vehicle would be required to derive at least 5 percent of its maximum available power from the rechargeable energy storage system. Larger credits would be available for vehicles that derive larger percentages of power from the rechargeable energy storage system and for vehicles that meet specified fuel economy standards.

[21] For a more detailed description, see the attachments to this testimony.

A credit of $1,000 to $8,000 would be available for the purchase of qualifying fuel cell vehicles after December 31, 2001, and before January 1, 2008. A fuel cell vehicle is a motor vehicle propelled by power derived from one or more cells that convert chemical energy directly into electricity by combining oxygen with on-board hydrogen (including hydrogen produced from on-board fuel that requires reformation before use). To qualify for the minimum credit, a fuel cell vehicle would be required to meet a minimum fuel economy standard for its weight class. Larger credits would be available for vehicles that achieve higher fuel economy standards.

Combined heat and power systems

To encourage more efficient energy usage, the NEPD Group proposes to provide a 10-percent investment credit for qualifying combined heat and power (CHP) systems. CHP systems are used to produce electricity (and/or mechanical power) and usable heat from the same primary energy source. To qualify for the credit, a system would be required to produce at least 20 percent of its total useful energy in the form of thermal energy and at least 20 percent in the form of electrical and/or mechanical power and would also be required to satisfy an energy efficiency standard. The credit would apply to CHP equipment placed in service after December 31, 2001, and before January 1, 2007.

This concludes our testimony. We would be pleased to answer any questions the Subcommittee may have.

NEPD GROUP PROPOSALS

Extend and Modify Credit for Fuel Produced from Landfill Methane

Current Law

Taxpayers that produce gas from biomass (including landfill methane) are eligible for a tax credit (Athe section 29 credit≅) equal to $3 per barrel-of-oil equivalent. For this purpose, a barrel-of-oil equivalent is the amount of gas that has a Btu (British thermal unit) content of 5.8 million. To qualify for the credit, the gas must be produced domestically from a facility placed in service by the taxpayer before July 1, 1998, pursuant to a written binding contract in effect before January 1, 1997. In addition, the gas must be sold to an unrelated person before January 1, 2008.

The amount of the section 29 credit generally is adjusted by an inflation adjustment factor for the calendar year in which the sale occurs. The inflation adjustment factor for the 2000 taxable year was 2.0454, and the inflation-adjusted amount of the credit for that year was $6.14 per barrel or barrel equivalent. The credit begins to phase out if the annual average unregulated wellhead price per barrel of domestic crude oil exceeds $23.50 multiplied by the inflation adjustment factor. For 2000, the inflation adjusted threshold for onset of the phaseout was $48.07 ($23.50 x 2.0454) and the average wellhead price for that year was $26.73.

The amount of the section 29 credit allowable with respect to a project is reduced by any unrecaptured business energy tax credit or enhanced oil recovery credit claimed with respect to such project.

The section 29 credit may not be used to offset alternative minimum tax liability. Any unused section 29 credit generally may not be carried back or forward to another taxable year; however, a taxpayer receives a credit for prior year minimum tax liability to the extent that a section 29 credit is disallowed as a result of the operation of the alternative minimum tax. The credit is limited to what would have been the regular tax liability but for the alternative minimum tax.

Reasons for Change

The tax credit helps make fuel produced from landfill methane competitive with other fuels. Extending the credit would continue the important contribution of this renewable energy source to the Nation=s long-term energy supply.

Proposal

The credit would be allowed for fuel produced from landfill methane if the fuel is produced from a facility (or portion of a facility) placed in service after December 31, 2001, and before January 1, 2011, and is sold (or used to produce electricity that is sold) before January 1, 2011. The credit for fuel produced at landfills subject to EPA=s 1996 New Source Performance Standards/Emissions Guidelines would be limited to two-thirds of the otherwise applicable amount beginning on January 1, 2008, if any portion of the facility for producing fuel at the landfill was placed in service before July 1, 1998, and on January 1, 2002, in all other cases. The proposal would clarify, for purposes of determining the extent to which a facility is placed in service after December 31, 2001, that the facility includes the wells, pipes, and related components used to collect landfill methane and that only production attributable to wells, pipes, and related components placed in service after December 31, 2001, is treated as produced from the portion of the facility placed in service after that date.

Extension of Tax Incentives for Ethanol

Current Law

Current law provides an income tax credit and an excise tax exemption for ethanol and renewable source methanol used as a fuel. In general, the income tax credit for ethanol is 53 cents per gallon, but small ethanol producers (i.e., those producing less than 30 million gallons of ethanol per year) qualify for a credit of 63 cents per gallon on the first 15 million gallons of ethanol produced in a year. A credit of 60 cents per gallon is allowed for renewable source methanol.

As an alternative to the income tax credit, gasohol blenders may claim a gasoline tax exemption of 53 cents for each gallon of ethanol and 60 cents for each gallon of renewable source methanol that is blended into qualifying gasohol.

The income tax credit expires on December 31, 2007, and the excise tax exemption expires on September 30, 2007. In addition, the ethanol credit and exemption are each reduced by 1 cent per gallon in 2003 and by an additional 1 cent per gallon in 2005. Neither the credit nor the exemption apply during any period in which motor fuel taxes dedicated to the Highway Trust Fund are limited to 4.3 cents per gallon. Under current law, the motor fuel tax dedicated to the Highway Trust Fund will be limited to 4.3 cents per gallon beginning on October 1, 2005.

Reasons for Change

The tax credit and excise tax exemption help make ethanol and renewable source methanol competitive with other fuels. Extending the credit and exemption at their current levels would continue the important contribution of these renewable energy sources to the Nation=s long-term energy supply.

Proposal

The income tax credit and the excise tax exemption would be extended through December 31, 2010. The current law rule providing that neither the credit nor the exemption apply during any period in which motor fuel taxes dedicated to the Highway Trust Fund are limited to 4.3 cents per gallon would be retained.

Provide Tax Credit for Certain Hybrid and Fuel Cell Vehicles

Current Law

No generally available income tax credit for purchases of hybrid vehicles is available currently. A 10-percent tax credit is provided for the cost of a qualified electric vehicle, up to a maximum credit of $4,000. A qualified electric vehicle is a motor vehicle that is powered primarily by an electric motor drawing current from rechargeable batteries, fuel cells, or other portable sources of electric current, the original use of which commences with the taxpayer, and that is acquired for use by the taxpayer and not for resale. The full amount of the credit is available for purchases prior to 2002. The credit begins to phase down in 2002 and does not apply to vehicles placed in service after 2004.

Certain costs of qualified clean-fuel property, including clean-fuel vehicles, may be deducted when such property is placed in service. Qualified electric vehicles do not qualify for the clean-fuel vehicle deduction. The deduction begins to phase down in 2002 and does not apply to property placed in service after 2004.

Reasons for Change

The transportation sector now accounts for 67 percent of US oil consumption. Cars, sport utility vehicles, light trucks and minivans alone account for 40 percent of US oil consumption, about 20 to 40 percent of all urban smog-forming emissions and 20 percent of greenhouse gas emissions. Almost all of these vehicles use a single gasoline-fueled engine.

Hybrid vehicles, which have more than one source of power on board the vehicle, and electric vehicles have the potential to reduce petroleum consumption, air pollution and greenhouse gas emissions. The proposed credits will encourage the purchase of highly fuel efficient vehicles that incorporate advanced automotive technologies and will help to move hybrid and fuel cell vehicles from the laboratory to the highway. These vehicles can significantly reduce oil consumption, emissions of air pollutants and carbon dioxide, the most prevalent greenhouse gas.

Proposal

The proposal would provide temporary tax credits for certain hybrid and fuel cell vehicles:

(1) Credit for qualified hybrid vehicles. A credit, of up to $4,000, would be available for purchases of qualified hybrid vehicles after December 31, 2001, and before January 1, 2008. The credit would be:

(a) $250 if the rechargeable energy storage system provides at least 5 percent but less than 10 percent of the maximum available power;
(b) $500 if the rechargeable energy storage system provides at least 10 percent and less than 20 percent of the maximum available power;
(c) $750 if the rechargeable energy storage system provides at least 20 percent and less than 30 percent of the maximum available power; and
(d) $1,000 if the rechargeable energy storage system provides 30 percent or more of the maximum available power.

If the vehicle=s fuel economy exceeds the 2000 model year city fuel economy, the amount of credit shown in (a) through (d) above would be increased by the following amounts:

(i) $500 if the vehicle achieves at least 125 percent but less than 150 percent of the 2000 model year city fuel economy;
(ii) $1,000 if the vehicle achieves at least 150 percent but less than 175 percent of the 2000 model year city fuel economy;
(iii) $1,500 if the vehicle achieves at least 175 percent but less than 200 percent of the 2000 model year city fuel economy;
(iv) $2,000 if the vehicle achieves at least 200 percent but less than 225 percent of the 2000 model year city fuel economy;
(v) $2,500 if the vehicle achieves at least 225 percent but less than 250 percent of the 2000 model year city fuel economy; and
(vi) $3,000 if the vehicle achieves at least 250 percent of the 2000 model year city fuel economy.

(2) Credit for qualified fuel cell vehicles. A credit of up to $8,000 would be available for the purchase of new qualified fuel cell vehicles after December 31, 2001 and before January 1, 2008. The credit would be $4,000, but, if the vehicle=s fuel economy exceeds the 2000 model year city fuel economy, the credit would increase by the following amounts:

(i) $1,000 if the vehicle achieves at least 150 percent but less than 175 percent of the 2000 model year city fuel economy;
(ii) $1,500 if the vehicle achieves at least 175 percent but less than 200 percent of the 2000 model year city fuel economy;
(iii) $2,000 if the vehicle achieves at least 200 percent but less than 225 percent of the 2000 model year city fuel economy;
(iv) $2,500 if the vehicle achieves at least 225 percent but less than 250 percent of the 2000 model year city fuel economy;
(v) $3,000 if the vehicle achieves at least 250 percent but less than 275 percent of the 2000 model year city fuel economy;
(vi) $3,500 if the vehicle achieves at least 275 percent but less than 300 percent of the 2000 model year city fuel economy; and

(vii) $4,000 if the vehicle achieves at least 300 percent of the 2000 model year city fuel economy.

The 2000 model year city fuel economy would be the following:

If the vehicle inertia weight class is:	The 2000 model year city fuel economy is: For a passenger automobile:	For a light truck:
1,500 or 1,750 lbs	43.7 mpg	37.6 mpg
2,000 lbs	38.3 mpg	33.7 mpg
2,250 lbs	34.1 mpg	30.6 mpg
2,500 lbs	30.7 mpg	28.0 mpg
2,750 lbs	27.9 mpg	25.9 mpg
3,000 lbs	25.6 mpg	24.1 mpg
3,500 lbs	22.0 mpg	21.3 mpg
4,000 lbs	19.3 mpg	19.0 mpg
4,500 lbs	17.2 mpg	17.3 mpg
5,000 lbs	15.5 mpg	15.8 mpg
5,500 lbs	14.1 mpg	14.6 mpg
6,000 lbs	12.9 mpg	13.6 mpg
6,500 lbs	11.9 mpg	12.8 mpg
7,000 or 8,500 lbs	11.1 mpg	12.0 mpg

The Avehicle inertia weight class≅ is defined in regulations prescribed by the Environmental Protection Agency for purposes of title II of the Clean Air Act.

A qualifying hybrid vehicle is a motor vehicle that draws propulsion energy from on-board sources of stored energy which are both: (1) an internal combustion engine or heat engine using combustible fuel, and (2) a rechargeable energy storage system. A qualifying fuel cell vehicle is a motor vehicle that is propelled by power derived from one or more cells which convert chemical energy directly into electricity by combining oxygen with hydrogen fuel which is stored on board the vehicle and may or may not require reformation prior to use. A qualifying vehicle must meet all applicable regulatory requirements.

Maximum available power means the maximum value available from the battery or other energy storage device, during a standard power test, divided by the sum of the battery or other energy storage device and the SAE net power of the heat engine.

These credits would be available for all qualifying light vehicles including cars, minivans, sport utility vehicles, and light trucks. Taxpayers would be able to claim only one of the credits for one vehicle and taxpayers who claim either credit would not be able to claim the qualified electric vehicle credit or the deduction for clean-fuel vehicle property for the same vehicle. Business taxpayers claiming either credit would be subject to the limitations on the general business credit and would be required to reduce the basis of the vehicle by the amount of the credit.

Investment Credit for Combined Heat and Power (CHP) Systems

Current law

Combined heat and power (CHP) systems are used to produce electricity (and/or mechanical power) and usable thermal energy from a single primary energy source. Depreciation allowances for CHP property vary by asset use and capacity. Assets employed in the production of electricity used by the taxpayer in an industrial manufacturing process or plant activity (and not ordinarily available for sale to others) have a general cost recovery period of 15 years if rated with total capacity in excess of 500 kilowatts. Electricity production assets of lesser-rated capacity generally are classified with other manufacturing assets and have cost recovery periods of five to ten years. Assets used in the production of electricity for sale have either a 15-year or 20-year recovery period. For assets that are structural components of buildings, however, the recovery period is either 39 years (if nonresidential) or 27.5 years (if residential), and the straight-line method for computing depreciation allowances must be used. For assets with recovery periods of 10 years or less, the 200 percent declining balance method may be used to compute depreciation allowances. The 150 percent declining balance method may be used for assets with recovery periods of 15 or 20 years. No income tax credit is provided currently for investment in combined heat and power property.

Reasons for change

{tc \l1 "Reasons for change}

Combined heat and power systems utilize thermal energy that is otherwise wasted in producing electricity by more conventional methods. CHP systems achieve a greater level of overall energy efficiency, and thereby lessen the consumption of primary fossil fuels, lower total energy costs, and reduce carbon emissions. An investment tax credit for CHP assets is expected to encourage increased energy efficiency by accelerating planned investments and inducing additional investments in such systems. The increased demand for CHP equipment should, in turn, reduce CHP production costs and spur additional technological innovation in improved CHP systems.

The proposal would establish a 10-percent investment credit for qualified CHP systems with an electrical capacity in excess of 50 kilowatts or with a capacity to produce mechanical power in excess of 67 horsepower (or an equivalent combination of electrical and mechanical energy capacities). CHP property would be defined as property comprising a system that uses the same energy source for the simultaneous or sequential generation of (1) electricity or mechanical shaft power (or both) and (2) steam or other forms of useful thermal energy (including heating and cooling applications). A qualified CHP system would be required to produce at least 20 percent of its total useful energy in the form of thermal energy and at least 20 percent of its total useful energy in the form of electrical or mechanical power (or a combination thereof) and would also be required to satisfy an energy-efficiency standard. For CHP systems with an electrical capacity in excess of 50 megawatts (or a mechanical energy capacity in excess of 67,000 horsepower), the total energy efficiency of the system would have to exceed 70 percent. For smaller systems, the total energy efficiency would have to exceed 60 percent. For this purpose, total energy efficiency would be calculated as the sum of the useful electrical, thermal, and mechanical power produced by the system at normal operating rates, measured on a Btu basis, divided by the lower heating value of the primary fuel source for the system supplied. The credit would be allowed with respect to qualified CHP property only if its eligibility is verified under regulations prescribed by the Secretary of the Treasury.

Investments in qualified CHP assets that are otherwise assigned cost recovery periods of less than 15 years would be eligible for the credit, provided that the taxpayer elected to treat such property as having a 22-year class life. Thus, regular tax depreciation allowances would be calculated using a 15-year recovery period and the 150 percent declining balance method.

The credit would be treated as energy property under the investment credit component of the section 38 general business credit, and would be subject to the rules and limitations governing such property. Taxpayers using the credit for CHP equipment would not be entitled to any other tax credit for the same equipment.

The credit would apply to investments in CHP equipment placed in service after December 31, 2001, but before January 1, 2007.

DRAFT – Not for Release

(House Rules)

H.R. 1088 - Investor and Capital Markets Fee Relief Act
(Rep. Fossella (R) New York and 45 cosponsors)

The Administration strongly supports efforts to provide fee relief to the Nation's growing number of investors and urges the House to pass the fee reduction provisions of H.R. 1088, which are very similar to those of its companion legislation in the Senate. Currently, fees are collected far in excess of the Securities and Exchange Commission's budget, acting as a burden on investors and discouraging investment. The bill would return those excess fees to market participants while ensuring that the Commission continues to be funded at a level that will allow it to effectively fulfill its mission. This legislation fits into the responsible budget framework agreed to by the President and Congress.

While the Administration supports fee relief for investors, the Administration strongly opposes the inclusion of the pay parity provisions in this bill. The Administration is concerned with the ability of all Federal agencies to attract and retain qualified employees for highly-skilled positions. The Administration plans to systematically address a broad range of human resource practices to improve Federal employment opportunities and reduce existing disincentives to seeking Federal employment. Pay is only one component to be considered among several factors. The Administration has concerns with any legislation that would exempt individual agencies from all or part of title 5 of the U.S. Code, adversely affecting the portability of Federal employees and fragmenting personnel systems. The Administration believes its comprehensive approach to Federal workforce issues will ultimately be a greater benefit to all agencies.

Pay-As-You-Go Scoring

Any law that would reduce receipts is subject to the pay-as-you-go requirements of the Balanced Budget and Emergency Deficit Control Act. Accordingly, H.R. 1088 or any substitute amendment in lieu thereof, that would also reduce revenues, will be subject to the pay-as-you-go requirement. OMB's preliminary scoring estimates indicate that the bill would result in a net loss of receipts of $1.3 billion in FY 2002 and a total of $8.2 billion during FYs 2002-2006. The Administration will work with Congress to ensure that any unintended sequester of spending does not occur under current law or the enactment of any other proposals that meet the President's objectives to reduce the debt, fund priority initiatives, and grant tax relief to all income tax paying Americans.

This Statement of Administration Policy was developed by the Legislative Reference Division (Macecevic), in consultation with the Department of the Treasury (Dorsey), the Office of Personnel Management (Wolf), NEC (Malmgren), WHGC (Bowen), BRD (Lobron/Lee/Moran), OMB/LA (Loper), EAD (Smythe), HTF (Abrams/Vyas/Boden), and EHR (Fairhall).

OMB/LA clearance:

Administration Position to Date

The bill was reported amended by the House Financial Services Committee on March 28, 2001. OPM sent a letter to the Committee on May 15, 2001, strongly urging the Congress to strike any personnel provisions from the bill and stated its concern about the increasing trend toward exemptions from Federal personnel laws. The letter stated that OPM has recently approved special salary rates for certain SEC employees and time should be allowed to evaluate the effectiveness of these special rates and to consider the results of a current GAO study of the situation at the SEC.

The Administration has not taken a position on the related Senate bill, S. 143, which passed the Senate by Unanimous Consent on March 22, 2001. While both bills would reduce securities fees, the House bill would reduce certain fees that the Senate bill does not (fees on trades of single stock futures) and would eliminate fees on Trust Indenture applications. Transaction fees would be lower and registration and merger fees would be higher in the House bill than the Senate bill. Both bills would create pay parity for SEC employees.

Major Provisions of H.R. 1088

H.R. 1088 would significantly reduce the rates of fees charged by the Securities and Exchange Commission (SEC) on brokers, mutual funds, and other intermediaries for securities transactions and would create pay parity for employees of the SEC with several other financial regulatory agencies.

Background. Section 31 of the Securities Act of 1933 (the Act) imposed fees on transactions of exchange-traded securities at a rate equal to 1/500th of a percent of the aggregate amount of sales, and these fees were all to be collected as general revenue; the rate was increased in 1965 to 1/300th of a percent. Section 6(b) of the Act imposed fees on the registration of securities at a rate equal to 1/100th of a percent of the offering price, and these fees were also collected as general revenue; this rate was increased in 1965 to 1/50th of a percent. The 1983 Securities Exchange Act Amendments imposed fees on mergers, proxy solicitations, and other activities at a rate of 1/50th of a percent of the value of the securities involved, and these fees were also collected as general revenue. In several appropriations acts in the 1990s, the registration fee rate was increased to 1/29th of a percent and all fees collected in excess of 1/50th percent were to be credited as offsetting collections for SEC appropriations. In 1996, the National Securities Markets Improvement Act of 1996 (NSMIA) reduced the fees to their current levels (see specifics below) in an effort, based on projections of securities market activities at that time that

Reduction in Fee Rates and Elimination of General Revenue Component. H.R. 1088 would reduce these three SEC-imposed fees and eliminate the portion of fee collections recorded as general revenues. The bill would continue to allow fees collected in excess of amounts needed to fund the SEC to offset discretionary spending under the jurisdiction of the Commerce, Justice, State Appropriations Subcommittee. Note that the estimated revenue effects below capture only the revenue lost by eliminating the general revenue component of these fees. In fact, the fees credited to the Commerce, Justice, State Appropriations Subcommittee would increase versus OMB's baseline estimates by $200 million for FY 2002, $2.3 billion for FYs 2002-2006, and $5.4 billion for FYs 2002-2011. In scoring the revenue effect of the legislation, these additional fees are not counted because their collection is triggered by subsequent appropriations action.

Transaction (Section 31) Fees. These fees are collected when securities are sold; the fees are intended to cover costs to the government of supervising and regulating securities markets and participants. Currently, the fee is $33.33 per $1 million traded through national securities exchanges (collected as general revenues), national securities associations (offsetting collections), and brokers and dealers (general revenues) through FY 2006. After FY 2006, the rate is set to decrease to $12.50 per $1 million in transactions. Under H.R. 1088, the fee would be reduced to equal $12 per $1 million in FY 2002. After FY 2002, the SEC would set the transaction fee rate (at an equal rate for all participants) at the beginning of each fiscal year so that all transaction fees collected in a given fiscal year equal a specified amount – the target offsetting amount – and be recorded as offsetting collections. The bill would set these amounts as follows: $585.72 million for FY 2002; $679.32 million for FY 2003; $822.24 million for FY 2004; $976.32 million for FY 2005; $1,148.04 million for FY 2006; $880.88 million for FY 2007; $892.08 million for FY 2008; $1,023.12 million for FY 2009; $1,161.44 million for FY 2010; and $1,321.04 million for FY 2011. These fees would equal approximately $12 per $1 million in transactions through FY 2006 and after FY 2006, they would equal approximately $7 per $1 million, and a final adjustment in FY 2012 would occur to produce roughly the target amount for FY 2011 to be applied for transactions in all subsequent years. (OMB estimated revenue effect for FY 2002: -$600 million; FYs 2002-2006: -$4.3 billion; FYs 2002-2011: -$7.6 billion.).

Registration (6(b)) Fees. These fees, paid by companies at the time of filing a registration for securities that are proposed to be offered (e.g., initial public offerings), are currently set at $200 per $1 million of the maximum aggregate price of the securities through FY 2006 with, as stated above, a certain percentage credited as offsetting collections and the remaining collected as revenues. After FY 2006, the fee is set to decrease to $67 per $1 million and, under NSMIA, the portion of the fee collections counted as offsetting collections is scheduled to be gradually phased out ending in FY 2005. Under H.R. 1088, the fee would be levied at a rate of $125 per $1 million in FY 2002. After FY 2002, the SEC would set the transaction fee rate (at an equal rate for all participants) at the beginning of each fiscal year so that all transaction fees collected in a given fiscal year equal a specified amount – the target offsetting amount – and be recorded as offsetting collections. The bill would set these amounts as follows: $512.50 million for FY

2002; $589.38 million for FY 2003; $650.39 million for FY 2004; $790.08 million for FY 2005; $949.05 million for FY 2006; $214.20 million for FY 2007; $233.70 million for FY 2008; $284.12 million for FY 2009; $333.84 million for FY 2010; and $394.11 million for FY 2011, with a final rate adjustment in FY 2012 as with transaction fees above. (OMB estimated revenue effect for FY 2002: -$1.0 billion; FYs 2002-2006: -$6.2 billion; FYs 2002-2011: -$9.7 billion)

Merger/Tender Fees. Currently, companies pay these fees at a rate equal to $200 per $1 million of the value of securities proposed to be purchased as part of a merger at the time of filing and are collected as revenues. Under H.R. 1088, the fees would be $125 per $1 million in FY 2002 and thereafter adjusted to match the registration fee rate. (OMB estimated revenue effect for FY 2002: -$75 million; FYs 2002-2006: -$375 million; FYs 2002-2011: -$750 million)

Trades of Single Stock Futures. This fee levied on security futures transactions would be reduced from $0.02 to $0.0072 through FY 2006. After FY 2006, the fee would be further reduced to equal $0.0042 per transaction. The RMO advises that this provision will produce a negligible effect.

Trust Indenture Applications. This $100 fee for qualification of certain indentures under the Trust Indenture Act of 1939 would be eliminated. The House Financial Services Committee reports this fee raised only $2,300 during FY 2000.

Pay Parity for SEC Employees. The bill would allow the SEC to adjust the base rates of pay and other benefits for all of its employees comparable to the pay and benefits provided by certain other financial regulatory agencies. These agencies are the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation, the National Credit Union Administration, the Federal Housing Finance Board, the Farm Credit Administration, and Treasury's Office of the Comptroller of the Currency and Office of Thrift Supervision. Under current law, the SEC must follow the Civil Service's General Schedule for pay while the other institutions listed above may individually establish and adjust schedules of compensation and benefits.

Study. H.R. 1088 would require the SEC to study the extent to which benefits of fee reductions were passed along to investors and submit a report on such study to Congress within two years of the enactment of this legislation.

Pay-As-You-Go Scoring

H.R. 1088 would affect receipts and direct spending; therefore, it is subject to the pay-as-you-go requirements of the Omnibus Budget Reconciliation Act of 1990. This Office estimates that the reduction in fees would reduce revenues by $1.3 billion in FY 2002, $8.2 billion over FYs 2002-2006, and $13.5 billion over FYs 2002-2011. (These amounts are net of estimated increased corporate income tax collections, which are assumed to be 25 percent of the lost fee revenue.) These costs are not included in the FY 2002 Budget, but they are included in the congressional budget resolution.

(Do Not Distribute Outside Executive Office of the President)

This Statement of Administration Policy was developed by the Legislative Reference Division (Macecevic), in consultation with the Department of the Treasury (Dorsey), the Office of Personnel Management (Wolf), NEC (Malmgren), WHGC (Bowen), BRD (Lobron/Lee/Moran), OMB/LA (Loper), EAD (Smythe), HTF (Abrams/Vyas/Boden), and EHR (Fairhall).

Administration Position to Date

The bill was reported amended by the House Financial Services Committee on March 28, 2001. OPM sent a letter to the Committee on May 15, 2001, strongly urging the Congress to strike any personnel provisions from the bill and stated its concern about the increasing trend toward exemptions from Federal personnel laws. The letter stated that OPM has recently approved special salary rates for certain SEC employees and time should be allowed to evaluate the effectiveness of these special rates and to consider the results of a current GAO study of the situation at the SEC.

The Administration has not taken a position on the related Senate bill, S. 143, which passed the Senate by Unanimous Consent on March 22, 2001. While both bills would reduce securities fees, the House bill would reduce certain fees that the Senate bill does not (fees on trades of single stock futures) and would eliminate fees on Trust Indenture applications. Transaction fees would be lower and registration and merger fees would be higher in the House bill than the Senate bill. Both bills would create pay parity for SEC employees.

H.R. 1088 would significantly reduce the rates of fees charged by the Securities and Exchange Commission (SEC) on brokers, mutual funds, and other intermediaries for securities transactions and would create pay parity for employees of the SEC with several other financial regulatory agencies.

Background. Section 31 of the Securities Act of 1933 (the Act) imposed fees on transactions of exchange-traded securities at a rate equal to 1/500th of a percent of the aggregate amount of sales, and these fees were all to be collected as general revenue; the rate was increased in 1965 to 1/300th of a percent. Section 6(b) of the Act imposed fees on the registration of securities at a rate equal to 1/100th of a percent of the offering price, and these fees were also collected as general revenue; this rate was increased in 1965 to 1/50th of a percent. The 1983 Securities Exchange Act Amendments imposed fees on mergers, proxy solicitations, and other activities at a rate of 1/50th of a percent of the value of the securities involved, and these fees were also collected as general revenue. In several appropriations acts in the 1990s, the registration fee rate was increased to 1/29th of a percent and all fees collected in excess of 1/50th percent were to be credited as offsetting collections for SEC appropriations. In 1996, the National Securities Markets Improvement Act of 1996 (NSMIA) reduced the fees to their current levels (see specifics below) in an effort, based on projections of securities market activities at that time that total fee collections would fall, to allow the SEC to collect only enough fees to approximately equal the cost of running the SEC. (Due to recent surges in market activity, fee collections have risen much higher than expected.) Under NSMIA, fee rates would sharply decline in FY 2007.

Reduction in Fee Rates and Elimination of General Revenue Component. H.R. 1088 would reduce these three SEC-imposed fees and eliminate the portion of fee collections recorded as general revenues. The bill would continue to allow fees collected in excess of amounts needed to fund the SEC to offset discretionary spending under the jurisdiction of the Commerce, Justice, State Appropriations Subcommittee. Note that the estimated revenue effects below capture only the revenue lost by eliminating the general revenue component of these fees. In fact, the fees credited to the Commerce, Justice, State Appropriations Subcommittee would increase versus OMB's baseline estimates by $200 million for FY 2002, $2.3 billion for FYs 2002-2006, and $5.4 billion for FYs 2002-2011. In scoring the revenue effect of the legislation, these additional fees are not counted because their collection is triggered by subsequent appropriations action.

Transaction (Section 31) Fees. These fees are collected when securities are sold; the fees are intended to cover costs to the government of supervising and regulating securities markets and participants. Currently, the fee is $33.33 per $1 million traded through national securities exchanges (collected as general revenues), national securities associations (offsetting collections), and brokers and dealers (general revenues) through FY 2006. After FY 2006, the rate is set to decrease to $12.50 per $1 million in transactions. Under H.R. 1088, the fee would be reduced to equal $12 per $1 million in FY 2002. After FY 2002, the SEC would set the transaction fee rate (at an equal rate for all participants) at the beginning of each fiscal year so that all transaction fees collected in a given fiscal year equal a specified amount – the target offsetting amount – and be recorded as offsetting collections. The bill would set these amounts as follows: $585.72 million for FY 2002; $679.32 million for FY 2003; $822.24 million for FY 2004; $976.32 million for FY 2005; $1,148.04 million for FY 2006; $880.88 million for FY 2007; $892.08 million for FY 2008; $1,023.12 million for FY 2009; $1,161.44 million for FY 2010; and $1,321.04 million for FY 2011. These fees would equal approximately $12 per $1 million in transactions through FY 2006 and after FY 2006, they would equal approximately $7 per $1 million, and a final adjustment in FY 2012 would occur to produce roughly the target amount for FY 2011 to be applied for transactions in all subsequent years. (OMB estimated revenue effect for FY 2002: -$600 million; FYs 2002-2006: -$4.3 billion; FYs 2002-2011: -$7.6 billion.).

Registration (6(b)) Fees. These fees, paid by companies at the time of filing a registration for securities that are proposed to be offered (e.g., initial public offerings), are currently set at $200 per $1 million of the maximum aggregate price of the securities through FY 2006 with, as stated above, a certain percentage credited as offsetting collections and the remaining collected as revenues. After FY 2006, the fee is set to decrease to $67 per $1 million and, under NSMIA, the portion of the fee collections counted as offsetting collections is scheduled to be gradually phased out ending in FY 2005. Under H.R. 1088, the fee would be levied at a rate of $125 per $1 million in FY 2002. After FY 2002, the SEC would set the transaction fee rate (at an equal rate for all participants) at the beginning of each fiscal year so that all transaction fees collected in a given fiscal year equal a specified amount – the target offsetting amount – and be recorded as offsetting collections. The bill would set these amounts as follows: $512.50 million for FY

2002; $589.38 million for FY 2003; $650.39 million for FY 2004; $790.08 million for FY 2005; $949.05 million for FY 2006; $214.20 million for FY 2007; $233.70 million for FY 2008; $284.12 million for FY 2009; $333.84 million for FY 2010; and $394.11 million for FY 2011, with a final rate adjustment in FY 2012 as with transaction fees above. (OMB estimated revenue effect for FY 2002: -$1.0 billion; FYs 2002-2006: -$6.2 billion; FYs 2002-2011: -$9.7 billion)

Merger/Tender Fees. Currently, companies pay these fees at a rate equal to $200 per $1 million of the value of securities proposed to be purchased as part of a merger at the time of filing and are collected as revenues. Under H.R. 1088, the fees would be $125 per $1 million in FY 2002 and thereafter adjusted to match the registration fee rate. (OMB estimated revenue effect for FY 2002: -$75 million; FYs 2002-2006: -$375 million; FYs 2002-2011: -$750 million)

Trades of Single Stock Futures. This fee levied on security futures transactions would be reduced from $0.02 to $0.0072 through FY 2006. After FY 2006, the fee would be further reduced to equal $0.0042 per transaction. The RMO advises that this provision will produce a negligible effect.

Trust Indenture Applications. This $100 fee for qualification of certain indentures under the Trust Indenture Act of 1939 would be eliminated. The House Financial Services Committee reports this fee raised only $2,300 during FY 2000.

Pay Parity for SEC Employees. The bill would allow the SEC to adjust the base rates of pay and other benefits for all of its employees comparable to the pay and benefits provided by certain other financial regulatory agencies. These agencies are the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation, the National Credit Union Administration, the Federal Housing Finance Board, the Farm Credit Administration, and Treasury's Office of the Comptroller of the Currency and Office of Thrift Supervision. Under current law, the SEC must follow the Civil Service's General Schedule for pay while the other institutions listed above may individually establish and adjust schedules of compensation and benefits.

Study. H.R. 1088 would require the SEC to study the extent to which benefits of fee reductions were passed along to investors and submit a report on such study to Congress within two years of the enactment of this legislation.

Pay-As-You-Go Scoring

H.R. 1088 would affect receipts and direct spending; therefore, it is subject to the pay-as-you-go requirements of the Omnibus Budget Reconciliation Act of 1990. This Office estimates that the reduction in fees would reduce revenues by $1.3 billion in FY 2002, $8.2 billion over FYs 2002-2006, and $13.5 billion over FYs 2002-2011. (These amounts are net of estimated increased corporate income tax collections, which are assumed to be 25 percent of the lost fee revenue.) These costs are not included in the FY 2002 Budget, but they are included in the congressional budget resolution.

The All Or Nothing Approach
School District Bans Student Clubs Rather Than Allow Christian Club
Associated Press

An Orange County high school district banned non-curriculum clubs from its campuses rather than allow the establishment of a Christian club. The action resulted from a lawsuit settlement by Saddleback Valley Unified School District, which agreed to exclude student clubs rather than allow a chapter of Fellowship of Christian Athletes on one of its campuses. The clubs will have to meet before or after school, and can no longer use campus bulletin boards or other school outlets to solicit members or publicize meetings, Bill Manahan, the school district superintendent, said Thursday.

His best and fullest statement on this topic is, I believe, his speech on

Also, Jason has a cd copy of all of the President's statements during the campaign, which is full-text searchable. Remind Brent of that in case he forgot.

G.O.P. Reports an 'Impasse' Over Senate Reorganization
Alison Mitchell

Senior Senate Republicans said today that they had hit an impasse in talks with the new Democratic majority leader over organizing the Senate because of disputes about how to handle judicial nominees. They called for the issues in contention to be brought to the full Senate floor for a vote.

After two weeks of talks with Senator Tom Daschle of South Dakota, the new majority leader, the five Republican negotiators went public with their complaints this evening as the Senate was shutting down for the week.

"We are reluctantly here to announce we are at impasse at the moment," said Senator Mitch McConnell, Republican of Kentucky.

The Republican senators said they had reached agreement with the Democrats on essential details like the size and makeup of committees. But they said they wanted the resolution needed to organize the Senate under Democratic control to contain an assurance that all nominees for the Supreme Court would come before the full Senate for a vote.

They said they also wanted the resolution to require that if any senator exercised the right under Senate tradition to block a home-state judicial nominee, the action must be revealed to the public. Senator Phil Gramm, Republican of Texas, called such disclosure a "good government, sunshine provision."

The Republicans handed out a report showing that since at least the 1880's, the Judiciary Committee had sent to the floor even those Supreme Court nominations that were opposed by a committee majority.

Mr. Daschle said in a statement that he would continue to try to resolve the outstanding issues "through negotiations and discussions rather than potentially divisive votes. "He said he had "stated publicly and privately my commitment to assuring a fair process for judicial nominees."

But he has resisted setting down any formal procedure. One Democratic Senate aide said that a "subtle distinction but an important distinction" existed between a guarantee that the Judiciary Committee would send a Supreme Court nominee to the full Senate and an informal tradition of doing so. "It would be an unprecedented new grant of authority to the minority party," the aide said.

The issue of judicial candidates and the ideological direction of the federal courts is one of the most delicate areas of dispute between the parties. During the six years that the Republicans controlled the Senate and Bill Clinton was president, the Republicans offered neither of the guarantees to the Democrats that they are now seeking.

But they say they have been disturbed by vows by some Democrats to stop conservative judges. And they say they would be willing to make the two provisions they are seeking permanent no matter which party has control of the Senate.

Senator Patrick Leahy of Vermont, the new Judiciary chairman, issued a statement saying: "There is more than a little irony in the charge from some Republican quarters that the Democratic Senate will treat President Bush's judicial nominees unfairly. Some Republicans seem to be expecting in Democrats the same wiles that the G.O.P. Senate used in killing so many of President Clinton's nominees."

If the Senate held a vote on the two issues, the Republicans would probably not prevail. But the vote would put the Democrats in the politically embarrassing position of opposing public disclosure and looking like they were ready to block President Bush's Supreme Court picks.

When the Senate switched last week to Democratic control with Senator James M. Jeffords of Vermont becoming an independent, Mr. Daschle became majority leader and Democrats became committee chairmen. But many of the details of the changeover need to be approved by a vote.

Mr. Daschle hinted today that a long stalemate could be a problem for Mr. Bush. "What that means is action in the committees on virtually anything is unlikely," he said. "We wouldn't be able to do nominations or legislation because obviously you don't have the full complement of membership on those committees."

Bush's Judgeships Stall in the Senate

Dave Boyer

Senate Republican negotiators late yesterday declared an impasse in their talks with Democrats on President Bush´s judicial nominees and said it was time to move forward with an up-or-down vote on the new Senate organization.

"We are only asking for fairness," said Sen. Mitch McConnell, Kentucky Republican. The negotiators said the next move is up to Senate Majority Leader Tom Daschle, South Dakota Democrat, on whether to call a vote.

Republicans want the resolution to reflect the three points on which both parties agree, and the two contentious matters voted on independently as amendments to the resolution.

Republicans said the full Senate should have the opportunity to make a determination and that they would not filibuster if the resolution is voted down.

"We´re simply asking for there to be a vote. When we have fundamental differences, we vote," said Sen. Arlen Specter, Pennsylvania Republican. Both parties agree Democrats will have a one-seat majority on every committee, with the exception of the Ethics Committee, which by tradition is equally divided.

All committee members will retain their assignments, and committee funding and space agreements negotiated by the chairmen and ranking members will remain in effect. Democrats do not agree with Republicans that "blue slips," or single-senator veto slips on judges from home-state senators, should be eliminated.

Democratic leaders turned up the pressure yesterday on judgeships, accusing the GOP of holding up White House nominations by not submitting to the Democrats´ proposal to reorganize the Senate.

"They´re making my life easier," said Sen. Patrick J. Leahy, Vermont Democrat and chairman of the Senate Judiciary Committee. "For the life of me, I don´t know why they keep waiting. I´m ready to start (confirmation hearings) within 10 days to two weeks of the time that we reorganize."

Republicans say Mr. Leahy, one of the party's most liberal lawmakers, is a prime example of why they are pressing Mr. Daschle for assurances that Mr. Bush's nominees will be treated fairly. Mr. Leahy was one of the most outspoken critics of John Ashcroft's nomination for attorney general in a bruising confirmation hearing in January.

In two weeks of talks, Mr. Daschle has resisted Republican requests to promise floor votes on appeals court candidates and Supreme Court nominees if the Judiciary Committee rejects them. Mr. Daschle says he will hold up a deal to reorganize committees with Democratic majorities until both sides agree on the issue of nominations.

Democrats say Senate Republicans are only hurting their own administration by not accepting Democrats' more vague, nonbinding assurance to be fair to nominees. "Unfortunately, what that means is that action in the committees on virtually anything is unlikely," Mr. Daschle said yesterday.

"We wouldn't be able to do nominations or legislation. We're going to ... probably be faced with a bottled-up array of , but we won't be able to do that." Asked if he is "jamming" the White House's agenda, Mr. Daschle replied, "That's not my choice. I think it would be inexcusable for us to disenfranchise elected members of the Senate who were serving on these committees just a week ago, and now to tell them they can't vote. That isn't my jamming them, that is simply a reality; that's what senators are here to do, is to make decisions."

Referring to the new majority party's power to investigate the administration, Mr. Daschle added, "In the meantime, we'll be satisfied, I suppose, with the opportunities to hold oversight hearings and other kinds of hearings. ..." For example, Sen. Joseph I. Lieberman, Connecticut Democrat, has used his new chairmanship of the Governmental Affairs Committee to hold a hearing on the administration's refusal to set energy price caps in California. Mr. Lieberman, who lost his bid for the vice presidency last year and is considered a likely presidential candidate for 2004, also plans to hold hearings on Mr. Bush's environmental policies.

Reception President Bush's Federal Judge Nominees Face From The Democratic-Controlled Senate

Bob Edwards, Anchor; Nina Totenburg, Reporting

This is MORNING EDITION from NPR News. I'm Bob Edwards.

For six years, Democrats fumed when President Clinton's judicial nominees were stalled by the Republican-controlled Senate. But the tables have been turned. Now there's a Republican president and a Democratic Senate. NPR legal affairs correspondent Nina Totenberg reports on what this could mean for President Bush's nominees.

NINA TOTENBERG reporting:

About 1/8th of the federal judiciary is vacant. But while 70 of the 102 vacancies are in the trial courts, President Bush has made just two nominations to fill those slots. Instead, the administration is concentrating on filling the 32 appeals court vacancies. The president has already sent the Senate names for half of those slots. There's a reason for that. The appeals courts are just one step below the Supreme Court, and these are the judges that are the final word in most of the cases heard across the country. Moreover, they are widely considered training grounds for the Supreme Court.

Indeed, it was the Clinton nominees for the appellate courts who were most ferociously stalled by the GOP in years gone by. The numbers tell the tale. Although Presidents Clinton and Reagan won confirmation for roughly equal numbers of judges in their two terms, Mr. Reagan won confirmation of 87 percent of his appeals court nominees, while Mr. Clinton won confirmation of only 61 percent, leaving the rest dangling without action.

In the last two years of the Clinton presidency, 17 appeals court nominees never got a hearing. Those who were confirmed waited, on average, more than a year. Contrast that with the wait for President Reagan's nominees in his last two years when the Democrats controlled the Senate, 17 weeks, and for the first President Bush's nominees, 15 weeks. The result is that now, after eight years of a Democratic administration, Republican appointees still dominate the influential appeals courts. President Bush wants to add to that advantage, and as Democrats see it, he has front-loaded the nomination process, concentrating his early judicial nominations in the appeals court. Senator Patrick Leahy, the Democratic chairman of the Senate Judiciary Committee, having served with six presidents, has this perspective.

Senator PATRICK LEAHY (Chairman, Senate Judiciary Committee): Presidents serve for no more than eight years; judges serve for a lifetime. And I think the Senate has a real responsibility to make sure that we have an independent judiciary, one that doesn't lurch to the right or the left.

TOTENBERG: And Leahy insists he will be fair.

Sen. LEAHY: I've talked with a number of Republican senators, and some have told me very frankly they were totally unfair to President Clinton and they're wondering if I'm going to do the same thing to them. I'm not. I'm not going to go for some kind of a payback.

TOTENBERG: Not surprisingly, the Republicans aren't taking those assurances at face value. A new group has sprung up, billing itself as bipartisan, and it's running ads, so far in just one state, South Dakota, which just happens to be the home of the Democratic Senate majority leader, Tom Daschle.

(Soundbite of advertisement)

Unidentified Woman: Our legal system affects us all. Every day courts make decisions that impact our families. That's why President Bush supports commonsense judges with character, experience and intellect.

TOTENBERG: Oklahoma Governor Frank Keating, a Republican, is chairman of the sponsoring group, Citizens for Common Sense Courts.

Governor FRANK KEATING (Republican, Oklahoma): The judiciary shouldn't be an arm of either party. Let's fairly get judges considered and confirmed.

TOTENBERG: But while Keating's group bills itself as bipartisan, the Democratic featured most prominently in its literature, former Democratic Attorney General Griffin Bell, says he is, in fact, not part of the group, that he declined to join, and yesterday the group retracted his name. That's not to say that Republican fears are unfounded. Liberal groups are already lining up to oppose a significant number of President Bush's judicial nominees. Nan Aron is director of the Alliance for Justice, an umbrella group of civil rights, environmental and consumer organizations.

Ms. NAN ARON (Alliance for Justice): We have grave doubts about most of the candidates nominated by President Bush. They were chosen by this president specifically because, while they may be very qualified and have excellent records on the law, they have shown by their actions or writings a real hostility to the gains made by women, minorities, and hostility to the role that government plays in improving the lives of Americans.

TOTENBERG: And specific groups have targeted specific nominees. Americans United for Separation of Church and State is opposing University of Utah Professor Michael McConnell, a respective conservative scholar who's long argued for greater accommodation between church and state. Also opposed to McConnell is the National Abortion Rights Action League, which cites his strong opposition to Roe vs. Wade. In addition, NARAL is also fighting the appeals court nomination of John Roberts, who, when he served as deputy solicitor general in the first Bush administration, wrote a brief that argued against federally funded clinics allowing doctors to discuss abortion with their patients. In that brief, Roberts contended that Roe vs. Wade should be reversed, a position he was quizzed about by Justice Harry Blackmun in a later case that he argued involving abortion clinics.

(Soundbite of interview)

Justice HARRY BLACKMUN: Mr. Roberts, in this case, are you asking that Roe vs. Wade by overruled?

Mr. JOHN ROBERTS: No, Your Honor. The issue doesn't even come up.

Justice BLACKMUN: Well, that hasn't prevented the solicitor general from taking that position

in prior cases.

TOTENBERG: But Walter Dellinger, who served as solicitor general in the Clinton administration, says it's very risky to judge judicial nominees by the positions they've taken as government lawyers.

Mr. WALTER DELLINGER (Former Solicitor General, Clinton Administration): The kind of arguments that John Roberts was making in the position of deputy solicitor general were the kind that a professional lawyer's expected to make when his client, the chief executive of which is the president of the United States, has run on those positions. I'm afraid that this is a process that will lead to the rejection of the most qualified of the nominees; that is, those who, like Roberts, have been out and have had a major lifetime of accomplishment.

TOTENBERG: Elizabeth Cavendish, the legal director of NARAL, disagrees.

Ms. ELIZABETH CAVENDISH (Legal Director, NARAL): He was aligned personally with these decisions. Again, he was a political appointee, and this was a signature position of the first Bush administration.

TOTENBERG: There's an irony in NARAL's position. Liberal groups were outraged when conservatives opposed some Clinton appointees because of positions they took as lawyers. I pressed the point on Cavendish. So you would say that those who are anti-abortion would be completely correct in voting their ideas and proposing pro-choice nominees.

Ms. CAVENDISH: It doesn't work both ways. The other side wants to turn back the clock on women's rights and roll back a fundamental right.

TOTENBERG: Just what will happen to the Roberts and McConnell nominations and others is unclear. When the Republicans controlled the Senate, those nominees had been slated for quick hearings. With the Democrats in control now, though, the first hearing is likely to be for Roger Gregory, an African-American from Virginia appointed by President Clinton to sit on an interim basis for a year on the 4th Circuit Court of Appeals. President Bush reappointed Gregory. Chairman Leahy says he intends to begin confirmation hearings in less than two weeks, but by tradition only one appeals court nominee is considered at a time, and historically there's an average of about one confirmation hearing a month.

With only three months left scheduled in this legislative session this year, that would mean three or four appeals court nominees possibly confirmed this year. Even that could be in doubt. North Carolina Republican Senator Jesse Helms blocked all of President Clinton's North Carolina nominees to the 4th Circuit, and nobody's quite sure what he will do about the Gregory nomination when it gets to the Senate floor, where he could put a so-called hold on it and send it into limbo.

Moreover, all confirmation hearings are on hold for the moment, because the Senate Democrats and Republicans have not agreed to a reorganizing plan in the aftermath of the Democratic takeover. The Republicans are seeking something that no Senate minority has ever had before: a guarantee that all the president's nominees will get a floor vote. Few observers believe the Republicans will get such an unprecedented guarantee, because the current stalemate is perfectly acceptable to the Democrats. If the Senate organization agreement is not forthcoming, it means simply that no nominations will move at all. Nina Totenberg, NPR News, Washington.

Republicans Seeking to Secure Votes on Judicial Nominees

Jesse J. Holland

Republicans backed down on Thursday from some of their demands for how the newly Democrat-controlled Senate should handle President Bush's nominees for the Supreme Court and federal judgeships.

Earlier in the week, GOP negotiators demanded guaranteed Senate votes on all Supreme Court and federal appellate court nominees, and elimination of the secret veto process for some judicial nominations.

After Democrats refused, Republicans sought to allow the full Senate - instead of negotiators - to decide whether the Supreme Court nominees should be guaranteed a vote. They also want the Senate to decide whether to make the senatorial veto process public instead of private, as it has been in the past.

Democrats say they will treat Bush's nominees fairly. Republicans fear Democrats will block Bush's judicial nominations.

"We're not asking for there to be a commitment," said Sen. Arlen Specter, R-Pa., one of the five GOP senators who have been negotiating with Majority Leader Thomas Daschle, D-S.D. "We're asking for there to be a vote."

Daschle, who is trying to reorganize the Senate to reflect the Democratic takeover, is opposed.

"I remain committed to trying to resolve the outstanding issues around the organization of the Senate through negotiations and discussions, rather than with potentially divisive votes," Daschle said.

Democratic aides said the idea of making public the secret vetoes likely would come up a meeting Tuesday of Democratic senators.

The maneuvering is the result of Vermont Sen. Jim Jeffords' decision to leave the GOP and become an independent, altering the 50-50 split in the Senate. Republicans had control by virtue of Vice President Dick Cheney's tie-breaking vote.

The two sides agreed that Democrats will gain a one-seat majority on each Senate committee, and the size of committees will be expanded to accommodate the one-seat Democratic edge. All Republicans will keep their committee assignments, and committee funding and space agreements negotiated at the beginning of the year will stay in effect as well.

Sen. Orrin Hatch of Utah, the top Republican on the Judiciary Committee, said that while filibustering the reorganization had not been discussed, GOP senators told negotiators to "go to the wall" over the judges provision.

Daschle said that if Republicans and Democrats are unable to agree on a reorganization, "action in the committees on virtually anything is unlikely."

The Case for Borking

Randall Kennedy

As the battle over the federal judiciary heats up, progressives must convince the general public of a basic proposition: The judiciary is an inescapably political branch of government whose agents, the judges, should be viewed in much the same way other politicians are.

To say that the courts are political may seem so obvious as to be banal. There is, however, a deep and widespread impulse to deny the political character of the courts. An important manifestation of this denial arises in the context of selecting, confirming, or rejecting candidates for the federal bench.

Many people bemoan, for example, what they term the "politicization" of the judiciary (as if there existed a golden age when judicial selection and judicial decision making were uncontaminated by politics). Liberals and conservatives, Democrats and Republicans have taken turns accusing each other of indulging in this unpardonable sin.

Progressives, however, should get off that unproductive rhetorical merry-go-round, accept the ineradicable presence of politics in the judicial arena, and strive to shape the judiciary in such a way that it will produce good, sound, progressive rulings. That will entail, among other things, lobbying on behalf of jurists who will advance the progressive agenda and against those who will be hostile to it.

Article II of the U.S. Constitution empowers the president exclusively to nominate federal judges, while it imposes a check on presidential authority by making the seating of a nominee dependent on the Senate's "Advice and Consent." Whereas the president is armed with veto power over legislation, the Senate, in effect, has veto power over judicial nominations.

Over the course of the nation's history, the Senate has exercised that power over Supreme Court nominees 29 times (and over district and appeals court nominees many times more). In addition to objecting to nominees on grounds of incompetence, dishonesty, or some other personal failing, senators have also voted nay for political or ideological reasons.

Opponents blocked George Washington's Supreme Court nominee Judge John Rutledge because of Rutledge's opposition to the Jay Treaty (despite the fact that the Senate had already confirmed him for a previous opening on the Court and that he had just served for an entire Supreme Court term as the interim chief justice).

Ulysses S. Grant's nominee Attorney General Ebeneezer Rockwood Hoar was not confirmed because he had opposed President Andrew Johnson's impeachment.

Herbert Hoover's nominee Judge John Parker was blocked because of Parker's perceived hostility to organized labor and the advancement of African Americans. And Ronald Reagan's nominee Judge Robert Bork didn't make it because opponents feared, among other things, that he would energetically attack abortion rights.

In principle there is nothing wrong with political blocking, even if doing so stems entirely from one particular issue. Would we now condemn a senator who, prior to the Civil War, voted against a nominee solely on the grounds that the candidate favored slavery? I would hope not.

Yet many people sneer at the notion of litmus tests for purposes of judicial selection or confirmation--even as they unknowingly conduct such tests themselves.

Litmus tests of all sorts are scattered about the judicial-selection process. When senators ask a nominee whether he or she believes that the proper role of a judge is to interpret rather than make law, or whether the Eighth Amendment should be deemed to prohibit capital punishment--all the while silently insisting upon an expected formulaic reply--they are imposing a litmus test.

Today, a candidate would not be nominated, much less confirmed, if he or she failed to genuflect convincingly to Marbury v. Madison (which established the authority of the Supreme Court to invalidate an act of Congress deemed to be in conflict with the Constitution), Brown v. Board of Education (which invalidated de jure racial segregation in public primary and secondary schools), or other once-controversial decisions that have become so thoroughly a part of the conventional wisdom that we no longer even perceive reactions to them as litmus tests of acceptability.

Since senators (and the public as a whole) should feel free to object to a nominee on political grounds, they should also feel free to demand that nominees truthfully divulge thinking that bears upon relevant judicial matters. Nominees--both liberals and conservatives--often claim that they cannot answer certain questions because to do so would be to prejudge a matter that may come before them.

But that response is typically a mere dodge to avoid controversy. Senators need not accept this.

REV_00127594

candidate refuses to answer relevant questions, senators should take that refusal into consideration when determining whether to vote to confirm. It makes no sense to offer lifetime tenure and all the power of judicial review to candidates whose thinking about crucial matters is unknown.

A transparent process in which ideological objections to judicial candidates are candidly voiced is a much-needed antidote to the murky "politics of personal destruction. "When politicians (again, both liberal and conservative) feel disabled from objecting to candidates on ideological grounds, they search high and low for pretexts on which to object: "He made this lewd statement to a colleague a decade ago," or "She committed this technical infraction of law."

Senators should not feel that they have to reveal or attack some personal blemish in order to justify a vote against a nominee. A deep, urgent, political disagreement is sufficient. It should be possible for a senator to acknowledge that a nominee is honorable, competent, and kind while still voting against confirmation because of the way the candidate would likely act as a judge. Nothing personal. Just politics.

Halting the Judgernaut

Alexander Wohl

As Capitol Hill adjusts to Vermont Senator Jim Jeffords's earthshaking repudiation of the Republican Party, the Senate Judiciary Committee is bracing itself to be the center of the aftershocks. The judicial branch of government, after all, is where a president is likely to have his most far-reaching impact; the judges he appoints will last much longer than the one or two terms he serves. And the Judiciary Committee--which is a key venue for debate about potent legislative issues such as abortion, school prayer, flag burning, and civil rights--is also the primary battleground in judicial-confirmation fights. Thus, with George W. Bush's first slate of nominees for the federal bench waiting for hearings, the most resounding political clashes of the summer are likely to occur on the Judiciary Committee's turf.

When Jeffords abandoned the Republicans, he threw control of Senate committees to the Democratic Party, providing Dems on the Judiciary Committee with the power to strangulate nominations in committee. (Actually, as of this writing, Republicans--aware of how defiantly they refused to allow many of Bill Clinton's nominations to get beyond the Judiciary Committee, and afraid of payback--are trying to force the Democrats to permit a full Senate vote for every judiciary nominee. A politically foolish position that will likely come to a quick resolution, this could bring all Senate business to a halt.) Given a free hand to nominate and confirm judges, Bush and the Senate Republicans would no doubt populate the federal bench with an army of Antonin Scalia clones--a legion of judges who, though perhaps ethnically diverse, share the extreme views of the Court's most conservative jurist. Indeed, the first batch of nominees the president sent to the Senate for confirmation has already made this clear. One logical response to such nominees would seem to be simply to block their consideration--especially since that was the Republican response to Clinton nominees whom the GOP considered to be too liberal.

But early signs indicate that the newly Democrat-controlled Judiciary Committee, along with the Senate as a whole, is taking a less direct and more wide-ranging approach, one that makes use of several different strategies at once while trying to minimize the danger of a public backlash. This highlights an important question , Is it worth letting all but the most conservative judges onto the federal bench--where they will preside for lifetime appointments, potentially lending important appeals courts a conservative coloration for up to 30 or 40 years--in order not to appear "obstructionist"? For some Democrats concerned with winning re-election, the answer may be yes. Still, if they're smart and stick together, the Democrats on the Judiciary Committee may be able to ensure that only the more moderate of Bush's nominees come to a full Senate vote--and to demonstrate the wisdom of their case to the American public.

"Don't Mess with Vermont"

How successful the Democrats are in preventing the confirmation of conservative judges will depend heavily on the committee's new chairman. A soft-spoken, liberal Vermonter, Patrick Leahy is a 27-year Senate veteran who has distinguished himself from many of his colleagues with his integrity and lack of ego. Smart and unafraid to play political hardball when necessary, he is adept at diffusing tension with gentle humor. (The day after the Jeffords switch, for example, "Don't Mess with Vermont" bumper stickers--attributed to Leahy--appeared around Washington, D.C.)

Leahy replaces Utah Senator Orrin Hatch--a fierce conservative whose favorite topic in recent committee sessions has been his own evenhandedness--as the ranking majority member on the committee. (Transcripts of recent hearings reveal Hatch to be remarkably, repetitively taken with his own "fairness.") Though Hatch has worked with Democrats on occasion, he fights hard for conservative Republican nominees and has the battle scars from the Robert Bork and Clarence Thomas Supreme Court nominations to prove it.

Leahy and Hatch consider themselves close friends and generally work well together. During Hatch's quixotic presidential run through early 2000, Leahy offered "to speak for him or against him, whichever would help more." But beneath this geniality, both sides are girding for war. Within days of Jeffords's announcement, Hatch was warning Democrats that "nobody's going to push me around." Leahy, for his part, has shown himself unafraid to take on the Republicans: He has challenged the GOP's hypocritical statements about the "quick pace" of Clinton nominations during Republican control of the committee and engineered a walkout from a hearing in which he felt the Republicans were trying to strong-arm Democrats into approving Bush nominees.

But for the first time in seven years, the Democrats have the numbers--if not literally (at this writing, the Senate leadership is negotiating whether the party balance on the committee will remain evenly split or a Democrat will be added to give the Dems a one-person advantage), then at least in terms of power. Majority status gives Leahy the gavel--and with it, the power to schedule and time hearings. Democrats now control the process: They decide when (and even if) nominees are brought up, how zealously they are interrogated, and how quickly they get voted on. And Senate Democratic aides say that Leahy is ready to take a much tougher line than others have in the past.

The recent debate over Ted Olson's nomination as solicitor general suggests how potent the Democrats' new majority status on the committee can be, if only they can muster the courage to exercise it. Erstwhile Senate Majority Leader Trent Lott was forced to discharge Olson's nomination from the Judiciary Committee (he did this under the bargain struck relating to the 50–50 Senate divide) the day Jeffords announced his switch: Lott knew that if he waited, the Democrats could use their new power in the Judiciary Committee to withhold the nomination from the floor. Moreover, after seeing Olson get voted in by the Senate--albeit by a razor-thin majority--Democrats surely understand that stopping someone is easier in committee than on the Senate floor, where there is the danger that some conservative Democrats will join the Republicans in crucial votes, as Georgia's Zell Miller and Nebraska's Ben Nelson did on Olson.

But now that the Democrats possess the power in the Judiciary Committee, will they be willing to use it? After failing to block Attorney General John Ashcroft and Solicitor General Olson, some Democrats said, in effect, "Well, we got enough votes to demonstrate that we could block a nomination--but we didn't do it because these were only cabinet appointments, not Supreme Court justices, which are lifetime appointments." Fair enough. But lower-court federal judges get appointed for life, too. Do the Democrats have the will to scrutinize and oppose district and circuit court candidates?

Whom to Oppose?

Democrats are still strategizing about whom they should oppose. This requires a calculated analysis not just of the nominees' records and the courts for which the judges have been nominated, but of public opinion. Democrats have seen how the perception of obstructionism or intransigence has sometimes hurt the Republicans--most notably after the government shutdown in 1995, during Clinton's impeachment in 1998, and last month when the GOP lost Jeffords--and don't want to be perceived that way themselves.

Both Leahy and the new majority leader, South Dakota's Tom Daschle, have said that they will work to prevent an ideological court packing and that they want "good, moderate, middle-of- the-road, credible" nominees. But already a number of Bush's nominees fall outside that description. This is particularly significant right now, because--after years of Republicans stonewalling Bill

Clinton's nominees--there are many vacancies, including 31 openings on federal appeals courts. Several circuit courts of appeal are very closely divided between liberals and conservatives. (The tiny First Circuit, for example, whose six judges cover Maine, Massachusetts, New Hampshire, Rhode Island, and Puerto Rico, has one opening and leans barely Republican; and the Third Circuit, which includes Delaware, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, and the Virgin Islands, is evenly divided and has two vacancies.) Just a few Bush appointees could tilt the judicial balance of the country in a decidedly conservative direction for a long time to come.

So Democrats considering circuit court nominees need to examine not just whether the prospective lifetime appointee has views so extreme as to be out of the mainstream, but whether adding that person to a court will change the ideological complexion of a particular circuit.

Given these parameters, there are several clear targets among the first group of Bush nominees. For instance, two Fourth Circuit nominees cry out for opposition. Terrence Boyle, chief judge of the U.S. District Court of the Eastern District of North Carolina, is a former aide to Senator Jesse Helms and, not surprisingly, is extremely conservative. He was already denied a spot on the court of appeals in 1991, when he was nominated by President George H.W. Bush, but the Senate did not act on his nomination. Helms retaliated by blocking all of President Clinton's nominees to fill North Carolina's Fourth Circuit vacancies. (Helms's desire to get Boyle on the court is ironic given Helms's repeated statements over the past several years that "there is no need to put more judges on that court because to do so would make it less efficient.")

The other nominee to the Fourth Circuit, South Carolina District Judge Dennis Shedd, is equally conservative; he served as chief counsel and staff director under former Judiciary Committee Chairman Strom Thurmond, who is now a senior committee member. Although Shedd has already attracted much opposition from civil rights groups, it will require coordinated strength to block him, given the tradition of deference to nominees who once worked in the Senate, even if only in a staff capacity.

But the Fourth Circuit already tilts heavily to the right. In contrast, the Sixth Circuit (which covers Michigan, Ohio, Tennessee, and Kentucky) and the D.C. Circuit are closely divided. Thus, Miguel Estrada, nominated for the D.C. Circuit, and Jeffrey Sutton, nominated for the Sixth, are judicial conservatives whom Democrats could confidently and appropriately oppose.

After the Supreme Court, the D.C Circuit is generally seen as the most powerful court in the nation, because of its role in interpreting statutes and agency decisions and because it has historically served as a springboard for potential Supreme Court nominees. Adding Estrada--who was a law partner of Ted Olson and is known for sharing the judicial philosophy of Justices Scalia and Thomas--to that court, along with another Bush nominee, the conservative John Roberts, would significantly enhance a slight conservative majority on this key bench.

The Sixth Circuit is even more closely divided. A former state solicitor from Ohio, Sutton--who has argued a number of times in the Supreme Court for expanded state power and for voiding congressional initiatives--has already been the focus of opposition. But another Sixth Circuit nominee, Ohio Supreme Court Justice Deborah Cook, also deserves a close look. In one representative decision, she denied a blind woman's request to be admitted to medical school because of the undue burden it would have placed on the school.

The 10th Circuit (which covers Colorado, Kansas, New Mexico, Oklahoma, Utah, & Wyoming) also is narrowly divided. The nomination to this court of Michael McConnell, a Federalist Society conservative and a professor at the University of Utah, has already generated opposition because of his extremist interpretation of the religion clauses of the First Amendment and their potential application to a variety of social issues ranging from school vouchers to gay rights.

Democrats can prevent Bush's nominees from being confirmed in several ways. First, of course, is to vote them down, either in committee or on the floor. Second is to delay their confirmation hearings indefinitely, as the Republicans did for so many Clinton nominees. (A variation on this option is to use control of the process to lengthen investigative hearings when that would be effective.) Expect Leahy to make use of both tactics. But more important is a third approach, which is to avoid nasty committee fights and use the potential power of a unified Democratic majority--for now, the committee will follow the caucus party line and vote up or down together--to influence the White House not to nominate right-wingers in the first place. It is therefore incumbent on the Bush White House, which until now has given only lip service to the idea of consultation with the Senate, to work with Leahy and the Democrats if it wants its nominees to be confirmed in a timely fashion.

Finally, several changes in procedure will slow down the process while adding an opportunity for more information and fairness. Leahy has already promised to reinstate the use of evaluations by the American Bar Association before any hearings. (This nonpartisan analysis of candidates, which every president since Dwight D. Eisenhower has used in considering nominees, was eliminated by George W. Bush.) Leahy is also likely to hold quick hearings for less controversial nominees and for nominees who are designated for courts with the greatest need before turning to the possible challenges. In this way, he can accumulate public support that he can later use in opposing the more conservative or controversial nominees. And he will probably not hold hearings for more than one nominee at a time--something that makes abundant sense but that the Republicans failed to do.

The prevailing view has been that nominees are presumed to be confirmable, unless senators or interest groups find something "wrong" with them. Some legal scholars have proposed the idea of requiring nominees to demonstrate why they should be confirmed, and there are signs that Leahy is open to this approach.

The Senate has an important role to play in evaluating and challenging individuals who are being appointed to a lifetime job of interpreting the Constitution. While Republicans are likely to cry "Bork!" whenever a nominee is criticized (even though the same Democratically controlled Congress that rejected Bork overwhelmingly confirmed Scalia), Democrats should not shy away from opposing any (and even many) of President Bush's nominees. Nor should they be tempted to give free passes to minority candidates if those candidates are too conservative. The Constitution says that the Senate will give its advice and consent on all nominations. Most Americans don't want a judiciary slanted sharply in either direction. We will soon see whether the new majority in the Senate has the guts and the ability to make a credible case to the American people that President Bush should not have the unilateral authority to shape the judicial branch in his conservative image.

At High Court, a Retirement Watch

Rehnquist, O'Connor Top List of Possibilities as Speculation on Replacement Grows
Charles Lane and Amy Goldstein

As the Supreme Court prepares to end its term this month, the White House, the Senate and interest groups across the ideological spectrum are preparing for the possibility that a member of the court might retire, with Chief Justice William H. Rehnquist's departure the most frequently mentioned scenario.

There is no direct evidence that Rehnquist, 76, or any other member of the court is planning to step down this year. Justice Sandra Day O'Connor, 71, recently dampened speculation about her departure, making an unusual announcement that she had "no plans" to leave. When Rehnquist was asked through the Supreme Court press office for a similar statement, he declined to comment.

Now that a Republican occupies the White House for the first time in eight years, however, court observers consider it more likely that Rehnquist or O'Connor, who were both longtime activists in Arizona Republican politics before being appointed to the court by Republican presidents, will step down sometime in the next few years.

"Make no mistake," said one longtime friend of the chief justice, Rehnquist would prefer to "return" his seat to a Republican president. But another justice recently told a friend there was no suggestion around the court that a departure is imminent.

Similarly, a lawyer who has regular contact with the White House counsel's office said, "I don't see the kind of frenzied activity by people who would be involved" in the administration if they knew a retirement were looming. In the past, many justices have directly or indirectly relayed their departure plans to the White House slightly before announcing them publicly, often at the end of the term.

Nonetheless, the thought of stepping down apparently has at least crossed Rehnquist's mind. When PBS interviewer Charlie Rose asked in February if he could imagine retiring, Rehnquist replied, "Sure."
Justice John Paul Stevens, 81, is older than Rehnquist and O'Connor, and he also was appointed by a Republican president, Gerald R. Ford, in 1975. But Stevens is not considered a likely candidate for retirement. He remains in vigorous health -- and, though still nominally a

Republican, has moved to the left in his years on the court. He dissented vigorously from last year's court decision, spearheaded by its most conservative members, to stop the Florida recount and effectively ensure Bush's victory.

There have been no changes in membership at the Supreme Court since Stephen G. Breyer replaced Harry Blackmun in the fall of 1994, creating the second-longest period of stability in the court's history and pent-up anxiety about when the next vacancy will occur.

In such an uncertain climate, the administration, Congress and advocacy groups are keenly sensitive to the opportunity President Bush will have to shape the court -- one of the presidency's most enduring powers. The White House and the Justice Department have been working for months to define the factors that would go into choosing a nominee, as well as beginning to sift through potential candidates.

"We are working hard to be prepared," said White House Counsel Alberto R. Gonzales, who oversees the selection process and is himself a potential choice. "Even during the transition we began thinking about possible nominees to the court."

On Capitol Hill, Republicans on the Senate Judiciary Committee have already begun "informal discussions and talks" about potential candidates, said Makan Delrahim, the committee's GOP staff director.

In the meantime, conservative and liberal advocacy groups have been working aggressively to try to influence the president's eventual choice -- and public opinion. Conservatives have been urging Bush not to back down from his campaign statements that the current justices he most admires are Antonin Scalia and Clarence Thomas, the members furthest to the right.

"We are looking to him to stay as close to that standard and as consistently close to that standard as he can," said Thomas L. Jipping, director of the judicial selection monitoring project of the Free Congress Foundation.

On the left, civil rights groups and women's organizations have been trying to stoke public fears that Bush's impact on the court could have dire consequences on issues ranging from abortion to education to affirmative action.

"If George W. Bush follows through on his promise to the right wing and nominates someone in the mode of Scalia and Thomas and Rehnquist, then there is going to be an epic battle," said Ralph Neas, president of People for the American Way.

The ideological skirmish that has broken out in Congress during the last month over Bush's initial nominees to lower federal courts is widely considered a prelude to the full-scale battle that a Supreme Court opening could create.

According to aides in the administration and on Capitol Hill, the cross pressures on the president in making his selection will be intense. On the one hand, the shift of the Senate this month to

Democratic control, analysts say, could hinder Bush's prospects for securing a replacement as conservative as Rehnquist. At the same time, the GOP's right wing is insistent that the president must not reduce conservative strength on the court by nominating anyone more liberal than Rehnquist.

"The difficulty is that the president has got to decide, 'How much political capital am I willing to bleed for a controversial Supreme Court nominee?' " said a conservative legal expert.

In such a contentious environment, names that have been considered among Judiciary Committee Republicans, sources said, include federal appeals court judges Emilio Garza, Edith H. Jones and J. Michael Luttig and the committee's ranking Republican, Sen. Orrin G. Hatch (Utah).

Other possibilities the president might favor, a variety of sources say, include conservative appeals court judges J. Harvie Wilkinson and Frank H. Easterbrook and Washington lawyers John G. Roberts and Miguel Estrada, both nominated by Bush last month to the federal appeals court here.

Bush also could look to members of Congress, such as Sen. Jon Kyl (R-Ariz.) or Rep. Christopher Cox (R-Calif.), who was being considered by the White House this spring for an appeals court seat but withdrew from consideration because of opposition from California's Democratic senators.

Administration officials declined to confirm any candidates they are contemplating. Bush has indicated he would like to nominate the first Hispanic justice, a move that might help him woo Latino voters in 2004 and improve his chances of winning confirmation in the Senate. In that context, Gonzales, a former justice on the Texas Supreme Court and a confidant of Bush's, is considered a prime candidate.

Asked whether he might accept a nomination, Gonzales said: "I am asked this question a lot. I typically say I don't intend to be a candidate. . . . My focus is working here, serving this president in this capacity."

Some conservatives consider Gonzales too moderate, and others view him as lacking the experience to become chief justice. To allay such concerns, Bush could make a double switch, nominating a current member of the court -- perhaps O'Connor --to replace the chief justice and naming Gonzales an associate justice.

"Politically, nothing beats that pair," said a lawyer who knows several of the justices personally.

Rehnquist's departure would not be as politically momentous as that of O'Connor, who is a swing vote on the closely divided court. Rehnquist is a consistent conservative, so the prospect of an equally conservative Bush-nominated successor for him would merely reinforce the existing ideological mix.

"If O'Connor is stepping down, then there will be all these arguments . . . about the balance of the court," said Terry Eastland, publisher of the conservative Weekly Standard and a senior Justice Department official in the Reagan administration. "With Rehnquist, the Democrats might be more willing to defer to the president in terms of judicial philosophy."

By regaining control of the Senate, the Democrats now run the Judiciary Committee, which will largely determine how quickly a nomination is processed -- and how much the nominee is grilled about his or her judicial philosophy.

Some Senate Democrats have begun discussing whether they would even employ a filibuster or other procedural tactics to block a Bush appointee from being voted on by the full Senate -- a sharp departure from past practice. In 1987, Robert H. Bork was allowed a vote on the Senate floor, even after the Democratic-controlled Judiciary Committee rejected him. Bork lost the floor vote, 58 to 42.

Rehnquist has been on the court since 1972, when he became an associate justice under President Richard M. Nixon. President Ronald Reagan elevated Rehnquist to chief justice in 1986, to replace the retiring Warren E. Burger.

In a recent interview with Fox News, Rehnquist said he had thought of departing before he was tapped to be chief justice. He acknowledged he has been having trouble lately remembering names and sent this wistful message to his television audience: "I'll tell them this, that I just think I've been extraordinarily fortunate in my life, and I'm very grateful for my good fortune."

Rehnquist's health, particularly severe back pain, has been a problem in the past. Although he still must rise from the bench and stretch his back during the court's two-hour oral argument sessions, he now appears to be in good physical and mental condition.

Under Rehnquist, a five-member conservative majority on the court has moved the law in a decidedly conservative direction, trimming affirmative action, clearing legal obstacles to the application of capital punishment, and limiting federal authority over the states.

Asked during the PBS interview if it would make a difference to him that there is a Republican in the White House, Rehnquist did not answer directly but did concede that there had "traditionally" been a "slight preference" by justices to retire during administrations of the party that appointed them.

Daschle's 'Intensive Care Unit' to Attend to Patients' Rights

 EXCERPT ***

REV_00127603

POWER PLAY: The Senate has once again gone into overtime in trying to nail down the fine points of its shifting power balance, delaying approval of a new resolution on committee organization because of an unresolved dispute over the handling of judicial nominations.

Without an agreement, freshman senators are left without committee assignments, many Democratic committee chairmen have to operate with Republican majorities -- and President Bush will have to wait awhile longer for action on his nominees.

The reason is that the power-sharing agreement negotiated when the Senate was evenly divided lapsed when Democrats took control this month, meaning that committee organization reverts to what it was at the end of the 106th Congress -- until a new agreement is reached.

After two weeks of quiet, behind-the-scenes negotiations, Republicans went public last week with demands for a guarantee that Supreme Court nominees will come to the Senate floor for a vote and for public disclosure when nominees are blocked by their home-state senators under the "blue slip" process. They said they asked Majority Leader Daschle to put the two proposals to a vote by the Senate, and he refused.

Later, Daschle issued a statement saying he has made both public and private commitments to "assuring a fair process for judicial nominees" and wants to resolve remaining organizational issues "through negotiations and discussions, rather than with potentially divisive votes."

On a party-line vote, which is customary on votes related to party powers, the GOP proposals would be defeated 51-49. But Republicans could claim a moral high ground in favor of full disclosure and fair treatment for a new president's nominees.

Senate Majority Leader Tom Daschle on Judicial Nominations
Tony Snow, Juan Williams

WILLIAMS: Senator Daschle, since Mr. Jeffords has come over, at least for caucus purposes, with the Democrats, there's been no reorganization of the Senate. So I'm wondering, how are you operating? And what pressures are there on you, as the Senate majority leader, to in fact now reach some deal with the Republicans so that you can get back to business?

DASCHLE: Well, Juan, I've told my Republican colleagues that I'm not going to jam them, I'm going to give them time to sort this out. These transitions are never easy. It took Senator Lott and I a couple of months to work out power-sharing.

But this is nothing compared to what we had to work through with power-sharing. That was unprecedented. The circumstances now are certainly not unprecedented, and we went through a lot of the same types of questions in the 1950s. Ao this is really a matter of whether we have the one-vote majority in committees, whether or not we revert back to power-sharing if something would change, whether or not we can work (Publication page references are not available for this document.) out staff and budgets. I think we can, and I think we're getting closer.

WILLIAMS: Well, now, what about the pressure coming from the GOP to say, listen, we want some assurances, we want them written down, and, in specific, concern about judicial nominations and the fact that they not get bottled up in committee but be able to reach to the Senate floor for a full vote?

DASCHLE: Well, I have said over and over that we're going to be fair. We are determined not to engage in any payback. We're not going to do what we think in many cases was done to our nominees in the last eight years. That isn't what we're all about.

What we want to do is move forward, assure that there are votes. But we don't want to abrogate the constitutional process of advice and consent, to make sure, absolutely certain that the judiciary committee has the prerogative and has the responsibility that it's been charged to take on. And that's what this is about.

SNOW: But, Senator, the constitutional obligation is for the entire Senate, it's not the Senate Judiciary Committee. And the founders never said, well, we want the Judicial Committee to decide who gets to serve as judges.

What have you told Republicans, other than that you'd be fair? Specifically, what have you promised them?

DASCHLE: Well, what I've promised them, Tony, is that we were going to assure them that every nominee, regardless of whether it's judiciary or executive, will have a fair hearing, will have an opportunity to be considered, and I can't go any further than that.

Obviously, we don't want to see happen what happened over the last five years, where some judges were kept without even the opportunity to be heard for over four years; where some senators, because you had secret holds, were given no opportunity to have the right to be considered and to be voted on. We're not going to do that. I don't think we should do that.

But I'm not going to engage or commit to an extralegal process that says, in some cases, regardless of what the Judiciary Committee does, we're going to bypass the committee and go straight to the floor.

SNOW: Why not? That's the agreement you just had.

REV_00127605

DASCHLE: No, no, I don't think we've ever had an agreement of that kind.

SNOW: Did you not have an agreement that, when you had the 50-50 power-sharing agreement, that nominations would go to the Senate floor?

DASCHLE: No, what we had was an agreement that either the majority or the minority leader could make a motion to proceed to a nomination. And I obviously would be willing to look at something like that. But never did we have an automatic commitment that any nominee or any bill would come straight to the floor.

Senator Joe Biden on Judicial Nominations

Tim Russert

MR. RUSSERT: You're also a member of the Senate Judiciary Committee.

SEN. BIDEN: I am.

MR. RUSSERT: Harry Reid, Democratic senator from Nevada and a colleague of yours, said the other day, talking about the Supreme Court: "We may wind up with another Scalia. Even though I disagree with the result of some of his opinions, his ability to reason is about as good as I've ever seen. I'm not looking for another Antonin Scalia, but I think that he brings with him such an intriguing background and such a brilliant ability to reason, that if we had someone like him, it would be a tougher decision for the Senate."

SEN. BIDEN: Wouldn't be tough for me at all. I've spoken to Justice Scalia. I consider us good acquaintances. So we kid each other occasionally when he--like, for example, I got a note or a call, I can't recall which, saying when the special prosecutor thing was--when we all voted against it, you know, reinstating, he called and says, "See, I was right the first time in the Morrison vs. Olson case."

I teach constitutional law--he called me and said, "I better come up and help you with those students. They're getting the wrong idea." As I've said to him, bluntly, I regret--the two most regrettable decisions I made were voting for him and voting for Reagan's tax cut.

MR. RUSSERT: Scalia was confirmed 98-to-nothing.

SEN. BIDEN: No--he was, but you--remember the context then? The context was we had a governor named Mario Cuomo saying he'd kick anybody's rear-end who didn't vote for the Italian. And, you know, remember he didn't answer any questions and no one forced him to answer any questions. Look, the fact that someone is brilliant does not qualify them to be on the Supreme Court. They can be brilliant and wrong. I would like--for example, I think it's important there is a Scalia on the court. I'd like another Brennan on the court, as well. But if you want someone who's brilliant in his reasoning, equally as consequential, I'd take Souter. He's equally as bright as Scalia. Writes better than...

MR. RUSSERT: As chief justice.

SEN. BIDEN: As chief justice.

MR. RUSSERT: You don't believe the Democrats would ever support Scalia to be chief justice of the Supreme Court?

SEN. BIDEN: I'm not speaking to the Democrats. I'm speaking for me. His view of the Constitution, that there are no unenumerated rights in the Constitution, that there's a very--this is the most activist Supreme Court we've had in the history of the United States of America, Tim. They have--they're the only court that has ever declared unconstitutional seven national pieces of legislation. People don't know. They declared, for example, the Older Americans Act unconstitutional as it applies to states.

MR. RUSSERT: But doesn't George Bush have a right to have conservatives on the Supreme Court?

SEN. BIDEN: Sure, he does. And I have a right to have who I want. This is what they call, you know, co-equal branches of government.

MR. RUSSERT: A liberal litmus test?

SEN. BIDEN: No, no. No, no, no. You're putting words in my mouth. You said, "Does he have a right to have conservatives?" To the degree that he pushes to the right, I can push to the center or to the left. The Constitution says that the United States Senate gets to determine--he gets to pick, his is to propose, ours is to dispose. We have from Rutledge back in the turn of the century with George Washington straight on through. We've rejected people whose views we believe are out of sync with what the Senate is.

I was asked advice by President Clinton when he had a chance to put people on the court. I went down to see him. I said, "Mr. President, when there's a divided government, you should pick someone in the middle. You should understand that." And he did. My advice to the president of the United States is if he wants a holy war, he can do that and pick another Scalia. But there's a divided government. The nation is divided on these issues. He should pick someone who is a centrist. He can be center right, but to pick someone on the extreme left or right would be a serious mistake, in my opinion.

Two Superior Judges Merit Confirmation

Jim Petro, Ohio State Auditor (Editorial)

During the 2000 presidential campaign, President Bush promised that he would nominate for federal judgeships only people of the highest integrity and professional competence and who possess the proper judicial temperament. Recently, Bush began delivering on that promise by nominating 11 men and women from across the country from both political parties for seats on the various federal courts of appeal.

Ohioans should be proud that for the first two of seven vacancies on the 6th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals, which covers Ohio, Michigan, Kentucky and Tennessee, the president nominated two outstanding Ohioans to serve on that bench: Ohio Supreme Court Justice Deborah L. Cook and former state solicitor Jeffrey S. Sutton.

As former assistant prosecutor, city law director in Rocky River and lawyer in private practice for the past 28 years, it has been my pleasure and privilege to have appeared before and practiced with thousands of judges and attorneys throughout the state. Without a doubt, Cook and Sutton are among the best-qualified lawyers to serve in the federal judiciary that I have seen in my legal career.

After a distinguished 13-year career in private practice in Akron, Cook joined the Ohio Court of Appeals in 1991, where she quickly developed an excellent reputation for her hard work and for the quality of her opinions. Elected and re-elected to the Ohio Supreme Court in 1994 and 2000, Cook has been praised by The Dispatch for her "keen intellect" and "careful legal scholarship."

The newspaper noted that she applies the law "without fear or favor" in crafting rulings that are governed by the Constitution and not by popularity polls or special interests.

Sutton graduated first in his class at Ohio State University Law School and served as a law clerk for two different U.S. Supreme Court justices, a rare honor. As Ohio's state solicitor, he was responsible for arguing cases of the utmost importance to Ohioans before both the Ohio and the U.S. Supreme Courts.

A prolific legal scholar, Sutton has written more than 50 law review articles and two legal texts. While keeping his private practice in Columbus, he also is teaching constitutional law at OSU law school.

When Bush submitted his nominees for the federal appeals courts to the U.S. Senate for confirmation, he called upon senators of both parties to restore civility and dignity to the confirmation process, and, most importantly, he asked for a prompt vote on each nominee.

Right now the court, based in Cincinnati, is critically short of judges to handle an ever-expanding caseload. Because of their impeccable credentials, Cook and Sutton should be swiftly confirmed.

Lack of News Makes Pontificating Difficult but Not Impossible

Joe Hallett, Dispatch Politics Editor

A big patch of white space, a fast-closing deadline and an empty head. Mid- June and the dog days are here already. Will loyal readers -- both of them -- notice if there is no column this week? Can't do commentary without some news. It's plain dead around here.

Speaking of death, maybe column grist could be ground from the pending U.S. Supreme Court case on whether mentally ill murderers should be executed. But what's the point now? We already killed schizophrenic Jay D. Scott.

The legal system, though, is always column fodder, and it would be timely to discuss President Bush's nomination of Columbus attorney Jeffrey Sutton to the 6th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals in Cincinnati.

But that has to do more with the political system, and editors are always griping that readers don't care about politics. Why waste a column on it? So what if the new Democratic majority in the U.S. Senate, for its own partisan aggrandizement, stands ready to ravage Sutton's reputation?

So what if the Democrats are salivating to tar Sutton unfairly as an uncompassionate conservative for having the audacity to argue successfully before the U.S. Supreme Court that the Constitution limits the ability of citizens to sue state governments for discrimination against the disabled?

Does anyone think for a moment that Senate Democrats will care that Sutton, at age 40, suffers from osteoarthritis, a degenerative disease that eventually would have put him in a wheelchair, if not for the miracle of hip- replacement surgery?

Will Senate Democrats give a hoot that Sutton, a brilliant attorney by virtually everyone's account, has a history of performing free legal work for social causes and groups? He has argued, pro bono, on behalf of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People, the Anti-Defamation League of B'nai B'rith, the Center for the Prevention of Handgun Violence and the American Civil Liberties Union.

Not long ago, Sutton took up the cause of a Chillicothe prison inmate and won a 9-0 decision from the U.S. Supreme Court, the ninth case in five years he had argued before the high court, probably more than any other private attorney.

Senate Democrats won't care. They're bent on getting back at Republicans for confirming only 61 percent of President Clinton's judicial nominees. When and if the Democrats give Sutton a hearing, they'll be more concerned about placating the constituencies who larder their coffers than putting a fair, honest person on the federal bench.

In a hearing process that too often has turned well-meaning nominees from both parties into bitter and spiteful judges -- Supreme Court Justice Clarence Thomas comes to mind --Sutton will be put through the political wringer, used and abused, to signal Bush that his Supreme Court nominees can expect even tougher treatment.

But, heck, nobody is interested in such political shenanigans except for maybe both readers of this column.

Well, then, there is the school-funding case. The Ohio Supreme Court will hear arguments Wednesday. For a third time, the court is expected to rule 4-3 that the legislature and governor failed to ensure an adequate and equitable education for Ohio's schoolchildren.

Lawyers for the state hope to turn one of two Republican justices, Paul E. Pfeifer or Andrew Douglas, who formed the majority with two Democrats in the previous decisions. A victory for the financially insatiable coalition of schools almost certainly will mean higher taxes.

The school-funding case has been around for 10 years. Yesterday's news is boring.

Oh, yeah, there's the Big Three Republican feud at the Statehouse. But that, too, is insider politics. Speaker Larry Householder of Glenford and Senate President Richard H. Finan of Cincinnati had their way with Gov. Bob Taft on the state budget and now they are poised to embarrass the governor by overriding some of his 49 vetoes.

Obviously, Taft's re-election in 2002 is not a high priority for Republicans controlling the General Assembly. For that matter, it appears not to be a high priority for Taft. While getting pushed around by legislative Republicans, he declined to use the bully pulpit to defend his own reasonable budget proposal, one that would not have gutted higher education.

Taft may have trouble telling voters what he stands for next year. But that's then and this is now, and there is nothing going on.

Unless, of course, anyone considers the latest scandal at the Ohio Department of Job and Family

REV_00127610

Services worthy of comment. News flash: Department illegally withholds more child-support payments from poor children. Routine stuff.

Maybe a column could be crafted around the big-money push at the Statehouse to permit video-gambling machines at Ohio's seven horse racetracks. But thanks to Taft, that's dead for the moment. Maybe something could be written about all the wacko legislation that right-wingers in the House want to pass. But why dignify wackiness?

My gosh, look at the time! All this white space to fill and nothing to write. Will somebody please make some news around here?

Heat Turned Up High in Judicial Kitchen

Russ Pulliam

He's been there, done that.

Federal Judge Daniel Manion recommends a thick skin and some experience in rough-and-tumble political battles for potentially controversial judicial nominees. President Bush already has submitted some nominations for federal court positions for U.S. Senate confirmation. But the big battle is yet to come with an anticipated opening on the U.S. Supreme Court in the next year or so.

When Manion was nominated by President Ronald Reagan for the 7th Circuit Court of Appeals in 1986, the mild-mannered former state senator from South Bend was surprised to become the center of controversy. The Manion battle was a warm-up for bigger ones over subsequent nominations of Robert Bork and Clarence Thomas for the Supreme Court.

Manion was blasted by People for the American Way and Senate Democrats for being unqualified for the court position. Sen. Edward Kennedy called him "the least-qualified" nominee he had ever seen for the federal appeals court. His critics found fault with his proof-reading because of errors in his correspondence.

Yet Manion also attracted endorsements from liberal Democrats who knew him back in Indiana. He made it to the bench after close votes in the Senate.

Manion understood that his critics weren't aiming the mud-slinging at him personally. What they really objected to was his willingness to look to the original intent of the Constitution. But he worries that mud-slinging campaigns that got worse under Bork and Thomas could deter qualified people from serving on the courts.

"I had a much thicker skin politically," he said in a recent interview. "I understood what was going on."

Good lawyers can make more money in private practice. "Why should I subject myself to this kind of attack?" he can hear potential candidates say. "I don't need to have my name dragged through the mud. Who knows what they'll come up with -- what kind of magazines you subscribe to. That's the kind of drivel it descends to," Manion added.

Critics might suggest that those who can't stand the heat should stay out of the judicial kitchen. But the judicial branch traditionally has been set above the partisan politics of the legislative and executive branches. Until the Bork-Thomas controversies, a long tradition was to evaluate court nominees on the basis of competence and personal character.

Manion has had the last word with the critics who attacked his alleged incompetence. "He made a liar out of them," commented a court colleague, William Bauer. "He is very bright, hard-working, thoughtful. Our job is to make sure we follow the Constitution. That's what he does very well."

Another Indiana lawyer, Peter Rusthoven, was associate counsel during the Reagan administration and gained an insider's perspective on the court nomination process. He suggests that more ideological battles over these nominations will undermine confidence in the courts as impartial decision-makers.

"Judicial nominations are no longer about, is this person smart, well-trained in the law, hard-working," he said. "Instead, you're nominating a person who is going to have one vote in a super-legislature, and that super-legislature is going to decide all kinds of things that the courts traditionally never decided."

With activist judges "writing" laws, the executive and legislative branches lose their chance to settle controversial political and social issues. Rusthoven is hoping for more strict constructionist judges who will be willing to defer issues back to the legislative branch when no clear constitutional issues are at stake.

He points to the 1857 Dred Scott decision as a notorious example of judicial activism, with the court taking over the slavery issue by ruling that blacks were not citizens. "It severely minimized the possibility of working out the slavery issue in the elected or political branches of government," he said. "It took away from the Congress the ability to regulate slavery in the territories."

The Senate ought to give Bush the green light to nominate strict-constructionist judges for the high court. A few more of them could help take the court out of some of the controversial political issues that are better left to the two elected branches of government.

Reason to Reject

Elizabeth Cavendish, Legal Director, NARAL

We take exception to the belief that it is unfair to challenge the qualifications of judicial nominee John G. Roberts Jr. based upon antiabortion briefs he filed as a government lawyer [editorial, June 7].

Mr. Roberts was a political appointee in the Reagan administration and served as principal deputy solicitor general for President Bush from 1989 to 1993. He competed for the job knowing that the administration had the goal of rescinding the constitutional right of reproductive choice.

During the Reagan and Bush era, the Justice Department argued to restrict or overturn the fundamental right to choose eight times in seven Supreme Court cases. Mr. Roberts helped author the brief in Rust v. Sullivan, defending the now-repealed "gag rule" that prohibits family planning providers from informing women of all their options when confronting an unwanted pregnancy. Saying the Roberts brief argued "in passing" for the overturn of Roe, as the editorial did, suggests it is inconsequential to urge that constitutional rights be repealed. Would The Post make the same argument about efforts to reverse Brown v. Board of Education?

In Bray v. Alexandria Women's Health Clinic, Mr. Roberts, on behalf of the Bush Justice Department, intervened as a friend of the court. The government's friendship was extended to Operation Rescue, which was terrorizing women who were trying to enter reproductive health facilities. Mr. Roberts argued that the nation's civil rights laws should be narrowly interpreted to preclude relief for women seeking constitutionally protected health services. Congress disagreed and the following year enacted the Freedom of Access to Clinic Entrances Act.

No one has an entitlement to a lifetime slot on the federal judiciary. The burden is on the nominee to demonstrate that he or she deserves Senate confirmation. This high threshold is essential to ensure that the judiciary will continue to guard our liberties against assault.

G.O.P. Reports an 'Impasse' Over Senate Reorganization
Alison Mitchell

Senior Senate Republicans said today that they had hit an impasse in talks with the new Democratic majority leader over organizing the Senate because of disputes about how to handle judicial nominees. They called for the issues in contention to be brought to the full Senate floor for a vote.

After two weeks of talks with Senator Tom Daschle of South Dakota, the new majority leader, the five Republican negotiators went public with their complaints this evening as the Senate was shutting down for the week.

"We are reluctantly here to announce we are at impasse at the moment," said Senator Mitch McConnell, Republican of Kentucky.

The Republican senators said they had reached agreement with the Democrats on essential details like the size and makeup of committees. But they said they wanted the resolution needed to organize the Senate under Democratic control to contain an assurance that all nominees for the Supreme Court would come before the full Senate for a vote.

They said they also wanted the resolution to require that if any senator exercised the right under Senate tradition to block a home-state judicial nominee, the action must be revealed to the public. Senator Phil Gramm, Republican of Texas, called such disclosure a "good government, sunshine provision."

The Republicans handed out a report showing that since at least the 1880's, the Judiciary Committee had sent to the floor even those Supreme Court nominations that were opposed by a committee majority.

Mr. Daschle said in a statement that he would continue to try to resolve the outstanding issues "through negotiations and discussions rather than potentially divisive votes. "He said he had "stated publicly and privately my commitment to assuring a fair process for judicial nominees."

But he has resisted setting down any formal procedure. One Democratic Senate aide said that a "subtle distinction but an important distinction" existed between a guarantee that the Judiciary Committee would send a Supreme Court nominee to the full Senate and an informal tradition of doing so. "It would be an unprecedented new grant of authority to the minority party," the aide said.

The issue of judicial candidates and the ideological direction of the federal courts is one of the most delicate areas of dispute between the parties. During the six years that the Republicans controlled the Senate and Bill Clinton was president, the Republicans offered neither of the guarantees to the Democrats that they are now seeking.

But they say they have been disturbed by vows by some Democrats to stop conservative judges. And they say they would be willing to make the two provisions they are seeking permanent no matter which party has control of the Senate.

Senator Patrick Leahy of Vermont, the new Judiciary chairman, issued a statement saying: "There is more than a little irony in the charge from some Republican quarters that the Democratic Senate will treat President Bush's judicial nominees unfairly. Some Republicans seem to be expecting in Democrats the same wiles that the G.O.P. Senate used in killing so many of President Clinton's nominees."

If the Senate held a vote on the two issues, the Republicans would probably not prevail. But the vote would put the Democrats in the politically embarrassing position of opposing public disclosure and looking like they were ready to block President Bush's Supreme Court picks.

When the Senate switched last week to Democratic control with Senator James M. Jeffords of Vermont becoming an independent, Mr. Daschle became majority leader and Democrats became committee chairmen. But many of the details of the changeover need to be approved by a vote.

Mr. Daschle hinted today that a long stalemate could be a problem for Mr. Bush. "What that means is action in the committees on virtually anything is unlikely," he said. "We wouldn't be able to do nominations or legislation because obviously you don't have the full complement of membership on those committees."

Bush's Judgeships Stall in the Senate

Dave Boyer

Senate Republican negotiators late yesterday declared an impasse in their talks with Democrats on President Bush´s judicial nominees and said it was time to move forward with an up-or-down vote on the new Senate organization.

"We are only asking for fairness," said Sen. Mitch McConnell, Kentucky Republican. The negotiators said the next move is up to Senate Majority Leader Tom Daschle, South Dakota Democrat, on whether to call a vote.

Republicans want the resolution to reflect the three points on which both parties agree, and the two contentious matters voted on independently as amendments to the resolution.

Republicans said the full Senate should have the opportunity to make a determination and that they would not filibuster if the resolution is voted down.

"We´re simply asking for there to be a vote. When we have fundamental differences, we vote," said Sen. Arlen Specter, Pennsylvania Republican. Both parties agree Democrats will have a one-seat majority on every committee, with the exception of the Ethics Committee, which by tradition is equally divided.

All committee members will retain their assignments, and committee funding and space agreements negotiated by the chairmen and ranking members will remain in effect. Democrats do not agree with Republicans that "blue slips," or single-senator veto slips on judges from home-state senators, should be eliminated.

Democratic leaders turned up the pressure yesterday on judgeships, accusing the GOP of holding up White House nominations by not submitting to the Democrats´ proposal to reorganize the Senate.

"They´re making my life easier," said Sen. Patrick J. Leahy, Vermont Democrat and chairman of the Senate Judiciary Committee. "For the life of me, I don´t know why they keep waiting. I´m ready to start (confirmation hearings) within 10 days to two weeks of the time that we reorganize."

Republicans say Mr. Leahy, one of the party's most liberal lawmakers, is a prime example of why they are pressing Mr. Daschle for assurances that Mr. Bush's nominees will be treated fairly. Mr. Leahy was one of the most outspoken critics of John Ashcroft's nomination for attorney general in a bruising confirmation hearing in January.

In two weeks of talks, Mr. Daschle has resisted Republican requests to promise floor votes on appeals court candidates and Supreme Court nominees if the Judiciary Committee rejects them. Mr. Daschle says he will hold up a deal to reorganize committees with Democratic majorities until both sides agree on the issue of nominations.

Democrats say Senate Republicans are only hurting their own administration by not accepting Democrats' more vague, nonbinding assurance to be fair to nominees. "Unfortunately, what that means is that action in the committees on virtually anything is unlikely," Mr. Daschle said yesterday.

"We wouldn't be able to do nominations or legislation. We're going to ... probably be faced with a bottled-up array of , but we won't be able to do that." Asked if he is "jamming" the White House's agenda, Mr. Daschle replied, "That's not my choice. I think it would be inexcusable for us to disenfranchise elected members of the Senate who were serving on these committees just a week ago, and now to tell them they can't vote. That isn't my jamming them, that is simply a reality; that's what senators are here to do, is to make decisions."

Referring to the new majority party's power to investigate the administration, Mr. Daschle added, "In the meantime, we'll be satisfied, I suppose, with the opportunities to hold oversight hearings and other kinds of hearings. ..." For example, Sen. Joseph I. Lieberman, Connecticut Democrat, has used his new chairmanship of the Governmental Affairs Committee to hold a hearing on the administration's refusal to set energy price caps in California. Mr. Lieberman, who lost his bid for the vice presidency last year and is considered a likely presidential candidate for 2004, also plans to hold hearings on Mr. Bush's environmental policies.

Reception President Bush's Federal Judge Nominees Face From The Democratic-Controlled Senate

Bob Edwards, Anchor; Nina Totenburg, Reporting

This is MORNING EDITION from NPR News. I'm Bob Edwards.

For six years, Democrats fumed when President Clinton's judicial nominees were stalled

by the Republican-controlled Senate. But the tables have been turned. Now there's a Republican president and a Democratic Senate. NPR legal affairs correspondent Nina Totenberg reports on what this could mean for President Bush's nominees.

NINA TOTENBERG reporting:

About 1/8th of the federal judiciary is vacant. But while 70 of the 102 vacancies are in the trial courts, President Bush has made just two nominations to fill those slots. Instead, the administration is concentrating on filling the 32 appeals court vacancies. The president has already sent the Senate names for half of those slots. There's a reason for that. The appeals courts are just one step below the Supreme Court, and these are the judges that are the final word in most of the cases heard across the country. Moreover, they are widely considered training grounds for the Supreme Court.

Indeed, it was the Clinton nominees for the appellate courts who were most ferociously stalled by the GOP in years gone by. The numbers tell the tale. Although Presidents Clinton and Reagan won confirmation for roughly equal numbers of judges in their two terms, Mr. Reagan won confirmation of 87 percent of his appeals court nominees, while Mr. Clinton won confirmation of only 61 percent, leaving the rest dangling without action.

In the last two years of the Clinton presidency, 17 appeals court nominees never got a hearing. Those who were confirmed waited, on average, more than a year. Contrast that with the wait for President Reagan's nominees in his last two years when the Democrats controlled the Senate, 17 weeks, and for the first President Bush's nominees, 15 weeks. The result is that now, after eight years of a Democratic administration, Republican appointees still dominate the influential appeals courts. President Bush wants to add to that advantage, and as Democrats see it, he has front-loaded the nomination process, concentrating his early judicial nominations in the appeals court. Senator Patrick Leahy, the Democratic chairman of the Senate Judiciary Committee, having served with six presidents, has this perspective.

Senator PATRICK LEAHY (Chairman, Senate Judiciary Committee): Presidents serve for no more than eight years; judges serve for a lifetime. And I think the Senate has a real responsibility to make sure that we have an independent judiciary, one that doesn't lurch to the right or the left.

TOTENBERG: And Leahy insists he will be fair.

Sen. LEAHY: I've talked with a number of Republican senators, and some have told me very frankly they were totally unfair to President Clinton and they're wondering if I'm going to do the same thing to them. I'm not. I'm not going to go for some kind of a payback.

TOTENBERG: Not surprisingly, the Republicans aren't taking those assurances at face value. A new group has sprung up, billing itself as bipartisan, and it's running ads, so far in just one state, South Dakota, which just happens to be the home of the Democratic Senate majority leader, Tom Daschle.

(Soundbite of advertisement)

Unidentified Woman: Our legal system affects us all. Every day courts make decisions that impact our families. That's why President Bush supports commonsense judges with character, experience and intellect.

TOTENBERG: Oklahoma Governor Frank Keating, a Republican, is chairman of the sponsoring group, Citizens for Common Sense Courts.

Governor FRANK KEATING (Republican, Oklahoma): The judiciary shouldn't be an arm of either party. Let's fairly get judges considered and confirmed.

TOTENBERG: But while Keating's group bills itself as bipartisan, the Democratic featured most prominently in its literature, former Democratic Attorney General Griffin Bell, says he is, in fact, not part of the group, that he declined to join, and yesterday the group retracted his name. That's not to say that Republican fears are unfounded. Liberal groups are already lining up to oppose a significant number of President Bush's judicial nominees. Nan Aron is director of the Alliance for Justice, an umbrella group of civil rights, environmental and consumer organizations.

Ms. NAN ARON (Alliance for Justice): We have grave doubts about most of the candidates nominated by President Bush. They were chosen by this president specifically because, while they may be very qualified and have excellent records on the law, they have shown by their actions or writings a real hostility to the gains made by women, minorities, and hostility to the role that government plays in improving the lives of Americans.

TOTENBERG: And specific groups have targeted specific nominees. Americans United for Separation of Church and State is opposing University of Utah Professor Michael McConnell, a respective conservative scholar who's long argued for greater accommodation between church and state. Also opposed to McConnell is the National Abortion Rights Action League, which cites his strong opposition to Roe vs. Wade. In addition, NARAL is also fighting the appeals court nomination of John Roberts, who, when he served as deputy solicitor general in the first Bush administration, wrote a brief that argued against federally funded clinics allowing doctors to discuss abortion with their patients. In that brief, Roberts contended that Roe vs. Wade should be reversed, a position he was quizzed about by Justice Harry Blackmun in a later case that he argued involving abortion clinics.

(Soundbite of interview)

Justice HARRY BLACKMUN: Mr. Roberts, in this case, are you asking that Roe vs. Wade by overruled?

Mr. JOHN ROBERTS: No, Your Honor. The issue doesn't even come up.

Justice BLACKMUN: Well, that hasn't prevented the solicitor general from taking that position

in prior cases.

TOTENBERG: But Walter Dellinger, who served as solicitor general in the Clinton administration, says it's very risky to judge judicial nominees by the positions they've taken as government lawyers.

Mr. WALTER DELLINGER (Former Solicitor General, Clinton Administration): The kind of arguments that John Roberts was making in the position of deputy solicitor general were the kind that a professional lawyer's expected to make when his client, the chief executive of which is the president of the United States, has run on those positions. I'm afraid that this is a process that will lead to the rejection of the most qualified of the nominees; that is, those who, like Roberts, have been out and have had a major lifetime of accomplishment.

TOTENBERG: Elizabeth Cavendish, the legal director of NARAL, disagrees.

Ms. ELIZABETH CAVENDISH (Legal Director, NARAL): He was aligned personally with these decisions. Again, he was a political appointee, and this was a signature position of the first Bush administration.

TOTENBERG: There's an irony in NARAL's position. Liberal groups were outraged when conservatives opposed some Clinton appointees because of positions they took as lawyers. I pressed the point on Cavendish. So you would say that those who are anti-abortion would be completely correct in voting their ideas and proposing pro-choice nominees.

Ms. CAVENDISH: It doesn't work both ways. The other side wants to turn back the clock on women's rights and roll back a fundamental right.

TOTENBERG: Just what will happen to the Roberts and McConnell nominations and others is unclear. When the Republicans controlled the Senate, those nominees had been slated for quick hearings. With the Democrats in control now, though, the first hearing is likely to be for Roger Gregory, an African-American from Virginia appointed by President Clinton to sit on an interim basis for a year on the 4th Circuit Court of Appeals. President Bush reappointed Gregory. Chairman Leahy says he intends to begin confirmation hearings in less than two weeks, but by tradition only one appeals court nominee is considered at a time, and historically there's an average of about one confirmation hearing a month.

With only three months left scheduled in this legislative session this year, that would mean three or four appeals court nominees possibly confirmed this year. Even that could be in doubt. North Carolina Republican Senator Jesse Helms blocked all of President Clinton's North Carolina nominees to the 4th Circuit, and nobody's quite sure what he will do about the Gregory nomination when it gets to the Senate floor, where he could put a so-called hold on it and send it into limbo.

Moreover, all confirmation hearings are on hold for the moment, because the Senate Democrats and Republicans have not agreed to a reorganizing plan in the aftermath of the Democratic takeover. The Republicans are seeking something that no Senate minority has ever had before: a guarantee that all the president's nominees will get a floor vote. Few observers believe the Republicans will get such an unprecedented guarantee, because the current stalemate is perfectly acceptable to the Democrats. If the Senate organization agreement is not forthcoming, it means simply that no nominations will move at all. Nina Totenberg, NPR News, Washington.

Republicans Seeking to Secure Votes on Judicial Nominees

Jesse J. Holland

Republicans backed down on Thursday from some of their demands for how the newly Democrat-controlled Senate should handle President Bush's nominees for the Supreme Court and federal judgeships.

Earlier in the week, GOP negotiators demanded guaranteed Senate votes on all Supreme Court and federal appellate court nominees, and elimination of the secret veto process for some judicial nominations.

After Democrats refused, Republicans sought to allow the full Senate - instead of negotiators - to decide whether the Supreme Court nominees should be guaranteed a vote. They also want the Senate to decide whether to make the senatorial veto process public instead of private, as it has been in the past.

Democrats say they will treat Bush's nominees fairly. Republicans fear Democrats will block Bush's judicial nominations.

"We're not asking for there to be a commitment," said Sen. Arlen Specter, R-Pa., one of the five GOP senators who have been negotiating with Majority Leader Thomas Daschle, D-S.D. "We're asking for there to be a vote."

Daschle, who is trying to reorganize the Senate to reflect the Democratic takeover, is opposed.

"I remain committed to trying to resolve the outstanding issues around the organization of the Senate through negotiations and discussions, rather than with potentially divisive votes," Daschle said.

Democratic aides said the idea of making public the secret vetoes likely would come up a meeting Tuesday of Democratic senators.

The maneuvering is the result of Vermont Sen. Jim Jeffords' decision to leave the GOP and become an independent, altering the 50-50 split in the Senate. Republicans had control by virtue of Vice President Dick Cheney's tie-breaking vote.

The two sides agreed that Democrats will gain a one-seat majority on each Senate committee, and the size of committees will be expanded to accommodate the one-seat Democratic edge. All Republicans will keep their committee assignments, and committee funding and space agreements negotiated at the beginning of the year will stay in effect as well.

Sen. Orrin Hatch of Utah, the top Republican on the Judiciary Committee, said that while filibustering the reorganization had not been discussed, GOP senators told negotiators to "go to the wall" over the judges provision.

Daschle said that if Republicans and Democrats are unable to agree on a reorganization, "action in the committees on virtually anything is unlikely."

The Case for Borking

Randall Kennedy

As the battle over the federal judiciary heats up, progressives must convince the general public of a basic proposition: The judiciary is an inescapably political branch of government whose agents, the judges, should be viewed in much the same way other politicians are.

To say that the courts are political may seem so obvious as to be banal. There is, however, a deep and widespread impulse to deny the political character of the courts. An important manifestation of this denial arises in the context of selecting, confirming, or rejecting candidates for the federal bench.

Many people bemoan, for example, what they term the "politicization" of the judiciary (as if there existed a golden age when judicial selection and judicial decision making were uncontaminated by politics). Liberals and conservatives, Democrats and Republicans have taken turns accusing each other of indulging in this unpardonable sin.

Progressives, however, should get off that unproductive rhetorical merry-go-round, accept the ineradicable presence of politics in the judicial arena, and strive to shape the judiciary in such a way that it will produce good, sound, progressive rulings. That will entail, among other things, lobbying on behalf of jurists who will advance the progressive agenda and against those who will be hostile to it.

Article II of the U.S. Constitution empowers the president exclusively to nominate federal judges, while it imposes a check on presidential authority by making the seating of a nominee dependent on the Senate's "Advice and Consent." Whereas the president is armed with veto power over legislation, the Senate, in effect, has veto power over judicial nominations.

Over the course of the nation's history, the Senate has exercised that power over Supreme Court nominees 29 times (and over district and appeals court nominees many times more). In addition to objecting to nominees on grounds of incompetence, dishonesty, or some other personal failing, senators have also voted nay for political or ideological reasons.

Opponents blocked George Washington's Supreme Court nominee Judge John Rutledge because of Rutledge's opposition to the Jay Treaty (despite the fact that the Senate had already confirmed him for a previous opening on the Court and that he had just served for an entire Supreme Court term as the interim chief justice).

Ulysses S. Grant's nominee Attorney General Ebeneezer Rockwood Hoar was not confirmed because he had opposed President Andrew Johnson's impeachment.

Herbert Hoover's nominee Judge John Parker was blocked because of Parker's perceived hostility to organized labor and the advancement of African Americans. And Ronald Reagan's nominee Judge Robert Bork didn't make it because opponents feared, among other things, that he would energetically attack abortion rights.

In principle there is nothing wrong with political blocking, even if doing so stems entirely from one particular issue. Would we now condemn a senator who, prior to the Civil War, voted against a nominee solely on the grounds that the candidate favored slavery? I would hope not.

Yet many people sneer at the notion of litmus tests for purposes of judicial selection or confirmation--even as they unknowingly conduct such tests themselves.

Litmus tests of all sorts are scattered about the judicial-selection process. When senators ask a nominee whether he or she believes that the proper role of a judge is to interpret rather than make law, or whether the Eighth Amendment should be deemed to prohibit capital punishment--all the while silently insisting upon an expected formulaic reply--they are imposing a litmus test.

Today, a candidate would not be nominated, much less confirmed, if he or she failed to genuflect convincingly to Marbury v. Madison (which established the authority of the Supreme Court to invalidate an act of Congress deemed to be in conflict with the Constitution), Brown v. Board of Education (which invalidated de jure racial segregation in public primary and secondary schools), or other once-controversial decisions that have become so thoroughly a part of the conventional wisdom that we no longer even perceive reactions to them as litmus tests of acceptability.

Since senators (and the public as a whole) should feel free to object to a nominee on political grounds, they should also feel free to demand that nominees truthfully divulge thinking that bears upon relevant judicial matters. Nominees--both liberals and conservatives--often claim that they cannot answer certain questions because to do so would be to prejudge a matter that may come before them.

But that response is typically a mere dodge to avoid controversy. Senators need not accept this.

candidate refuses to answer relevant questions, senators should take that refusal into consideration when determining whether to vote to confirm. It makes no sense to offer lifetime tenure and all the power of judicial review to candidates whose thinking about crucial matters is unknown.

A transparent process in which ideological objections to judicial candidates are candidly voiced is a much-needed antidote to the murky "politics of personal destruction. "When politicians (again, both liberal and conservative) feel disabled from objecting to candidates on ideological grounds, they search high and low for pretexts on which to object: "He made this lewd statement to a colleague a decade ago," or "She committed this technical infraction of law."

Senators should not feel that they have to reveal or attack some personal blemish in order to justify a vote against a nominee. A deep, urgent, political disagreement is sufficient. It should be possible for a senator to acknowledge that a nominee is honorable, competent, and kind while still voting against confirmation because of the way the candidate would likely act as a judge. Nothing personal. Just politics.

Alexander Wohl

As Capitol Hill adjusts to Vermont Senator Jim Jeffords's earthshaking repudiation of the Republican Party, the Senate Judiciary Committee is bracing itself to be the center of the aftershocks. The judicial branch of government, after all, is where a president is likely to have his most far-reaching impact; the judges he appoints will last much longer than the one or two terms he serves. And the Judiciary Committee--which is a key venue for debate about potent legislative issues such as abortion, school prayer, flag burning, and civil rights--is also the primary battleground in judicial-confirmation fights. Thus, with George W. Bush's first slate of nominees for the federal bench waiting for hearings, the most resounding political clashes of the summer are likely to occur on the Judiciary Committee's turf.

When Jeffords abandoned the Republicans, he threw control of Senate committees to the Democratic Party, providing Dems on the Judiciary Committee with the power to strangulate nominations in committee. (Actually, as of this writing, Republicans--aware of how defiantly they refused to allow many of Bill Clinton's nominations to get beyond the Judiciary Committee, and afraid of payback--are trying to force the Democrats to permit a full Senate vote for every judiciary nominee. A politically foolish position that will likely come to a quick resolution, this could bring all Senate business to a halt.) Given a free hand to nominate and confirm judges, Bush and the Senate Republicans would no doubt populate the federal bench with an army of Antonin Scalia clones--a legion of judges who, though perhaps ethnically diverse, share the extreme views of the Court's most conservative jurist. Indeed, the first batch of nominees the president sent to the Senate for confirmation has already made this clear. One logical response to such nominees would seem to be simply to block their consideration--especially since that was the Republican response to Clinton nominees whom the GOP considered to be too liberal.

But early signs indicate that the newly Democrat-controlled Judiciary Committee, along with the Senate as a whole, is taking a less direct and more wide-ranging approach, one that makes use of several different strategies at once while trying to minimize the danger of a public backlash. This highlights an important question , Is it worth letting all but the most conservative judges onto the federal bench--where they will preside for lifetime appointments, potentially lending important appeals courts a conservative coloration for up to 30 or 40 years--in order not to appear "obstructionist"? For some Democrats concerned with winning re-election, the answer may be yes. Still, if they're smart and stick together, the Democrats on the Judiciary Committee may be able to ensure that only the more moderate of Bush's nominees come to a full Senate vote--and to demonstrate the wisdom of their case to the American public.

"Don't Mess with Vermont"

How successful the Democrats are in preventing the confirmation of conservative judges will depend heavily on the committee's new chairman. A soft-spoken, liberal Vermonter, Patrick Leahy is a 27-year Senate veteran who has distinguished himself from many of his colleagues with his integrity and lack of ego. Smart and unafraid to play political hardball when necessary, he is adept at diffusing tension with gentle humor. (The day after the Jeffords switch, for example, "Don't Mess with Vermont" bumper stickers--attributed to Leahy--appeared around Washington, D.C.)

Leahy replaces Utah Senator Orrin Hatch--a fierce conservative whose favorite topic in recent committee sessions has been his own evenhandedness--as the ranking majority member on the committee. (Transcripts of recent hearings reveal Hatch to be remarkably, repetitively taken with his own "fairness.") Though Hatch has worked with Democrats on occasion, he fights hard for conservative Republican nominees and has the battle scars from the Robert Bork and Clarence Thomas Supreme Court nominations to prove it.

Leahy and Hatch consider themselves close friends and generally work well together. During Hatch's quixotic presidential run through early 2000, Leahy offered "to speak for him or against him, whichever would help more." But beneath this geniality, both sides are girding for war. Within days of Jeffords's announcement, Hatch was warning Democrats that "nobody's going to push me around." Leahy, for his part, has shown himself unafraid to take on the Republicans: He has challenged the GOP's hypocritical statements about the "quick pace" of Clinton nominations during Republican control of the committee and engineered a walkout from a hearing in which he felt the Republicans were trying to strong-arm Democrats into approving Bush nominees.

But for the first time in seven years, the Democrats have the numbers--if not literally (at this writing, the Senate leadership is negotiating whether the party balance on the committee will remain evenly split or a Democrat will be added to give the Dems a one-person advantage), then at least in terms of power. Majority status gives Leahy the gavel--and with it, the power to schedule and time hearings. Democrats now control the process: They decide when (and even if) nominees are brought up, how zealously they are interrogated, and how quickly they get voted on. And Senate Democratic aides say that Leahy is ready to take a much tougher line than others have in the past.

The recent debate over Ted Olson's nomination as solicitor general suggests how potent the Democrats' new majority status on the committee can be, if only they can muster the courage to exercise it. Erstwhile Senate Majority Leader Trent Lott was forced to discharge Olson's nomination from the Judiciary Committee (he did this under the bargain struck relating to the 50–50 Senate divide) the day Jeffords announced his switch: Lott knew that if he waited, the Democrats could use their new power in the Judiciary Committee to withhold the nomination from the floor. Moreover, after seeing Olson get voted in by the Senate--albeit by a razor-thin majority--Democrats surely understand that stopping someone is easier in committee than on the Senate floor, where there is the danger that some conservative Democrats will join the Republicans in crucial votes, as Georgia's Zell Miller and Nebraska's Ben Nelson did on Olson.

But now that the Democrats possess the power in the Judiciary Committee, will they be willing to use it? After failing to block Attorney General John Ashcroft and Solicitor General Olson, some Democrats said, in effect, "Well, we got enough votes to demonstrate that we could block a nomination--but we didn't do it because these were only cabinet appointments, not Supreme Court justices, which are lifetime appointments." Fair enough. But lower-court federal judges get appointed for life, too. Do the Democrats have the will to scrutinize and oppose district and circuit court candidates?

Whom to Oppose?

Democrats are still strategizing about whom they should oppose. This requires a calculated analysis not just of the nominees' records and the courts for which the judges have been nominated, but of public opinion. Democrats have seen how the perception of obstructionism or intransigence has sometimes hurt the Republicans--most notably after the government shutdown in 1995, during Clinton's impeachment in 1998, and last month when the GOP lost Jeffords--and don't want to be perceived that way themselves.

Both Leahy and the new majority leader, South Dakota's Tom Daschle, have said that they will work to prevent an ideological court packing and that they want "good, moderate, middle-of- the-road, credible" nominees. But already a number of Bush's nominees fall outside that description. This is particularly significant right now, because--after years of Republicans stonewalling Bill

Clinton's nominees--there are many vacancies, including 31 openings on federal appeals courts. Several circuit courts of appeal are very closely divided between liberals and conservatives. (The tiny First Circuit, for example, whose six judges cover Maine, Massachusetts, New Hampshire, Rhode Island, and Puerto Rico, has one opening and leans barely Republican; and the Third Circuit, which includes Delaware, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, and the Virgin Islands, is evenly divided and has two vacancies.) Just a few Bush appointees could tilt the judicial balance of the country in a decidedly conservative direction for a long time to come.

So Democrats considering circuit court nominees need to examine not just whether the prospective lifetime appointee has views so extreme as to be out of the mainstream, but whether adding that person to a court will change the ideological complexion of a particular circuit.

Given these parameters, there are several clear targets among the first group of Bush nominees. For instance, two Fourth Circuit nominees cry out for opposition. Terrence Boyle, chief judge of the U.S. District Court of the Eastern District of North Carolina, is a former aide to Senator Jesse Helms and, not surprisingly, is extremely conservative. He was already denied a spot on the court of appeals in 1991, when he was nominated by President George H.W. Bush, but the Senate did not act on his nomination. Helms retaliated by blocking all of President Clinton's nominees to fill North Carolina's Fourth Circuit vacancies. (Helms's desire to get Boyle on the court is ironic given Helms's repeated statements over the past several years that "there is no need to put more judges on that court because to do so would make it less efficient.")

The other nominee to the Fourth Circuit, South Carolina District Judge Dennis Shedd, is equally conservative; he served as chief counsel and staff director under former Judiciary Committee Chairman Strom Thurmond, who is now a senior committee member. Although Shedd has already attracted much opposition from civil rights groups, it will require coordinated strength to block him, given the tradition of deference to nominees who once worked in the Senate, even if only in a staff capacity.

But the Fourth Circuit already tilts heavily to the right. In contrast, the Sixth Circuit (which covers Michigan, Ohio, Tennessee, and Kentucky) and the D.C. Circuit are closely divided. Thus, Miguel Estrada, nominated for the D.C. Circuit, and Jeffrey Sutton, nominated for the Sixth, are judicial conservatives whom Democrats could confidently and appropriately oppose.

After the Supreme Court, the D.C Circuit is generally seen as the most powerful court in the nation, because of its role in interpreting statutes and agency decisions and because it has historically served as a springboard for potential Supreme Court nominees. Adding Estrada--who was a law partner of Ted Olson and is known for sharing the judicial philosophy of Justices Scalia and Thomas--to that court, along with another Bush nominee, the conservative John Roberts, would significantly enhance a slight conservative majority on this key bench.

The Sixth Circuit is even more closely divided. A former state solicitor from Ohio, Sutton--who has argued a number of times in the Supreme Court for expanded state power and for voiding congressional initiatives--has already been the focus of opposition. But another Sixth Circuit nominee, Ohio Supreme Court Justice Deborah Cook, also deserves a close look. In one representative decision, she denied a blind woman's request to be admitted to medical school because of the undue burden it would have placed on the school.

The 10th Circuit (which covers Colorado, Kansas, New Mexico, Oklahoma, Utah, & Wyoming) also is narrowly divided. The nomination to this court of Michael McConnell, a Federalist Society conservative and a professor at the University of Utah, has already generated opposition because of his extremist interpretation of the religion clauses of the First Amendment and their potential application to a variety of social issues ranging from school vouchers to gay rights.

Democrats can prevent Bush's nominees from being confirmed in several ways. First, of course, is to vote them down, either in committee or on the floor. Second is to delay their confirmation hearings indefinitely, as the Republicans did for so many Clinton nominees. (A variation on this option is to use control of the process to lengthen investigative hearings when that would be effective.) Expect Leahy to make use of both tactics. But more important is a third approach, which is to avoid nasty committee fights and use the potential power of a unified Democratic majority--for now, the committee will follow the caucus party line and vote up or down together--to influence the White House not to nominate right-wingers in the first place. It is therefore incumbent on the Bush White House, which until now has given only lip service to the idea of consultation with the Senate, to work with Leahy and the Democrats if it wants its nominees to be confirmed in a timely fashion.

Finally, several changes in procedure will slow down the process while adding an opportunity for more information and fairness. Leahy has already promised to reinstate the use of evaluations by the American Bar Association before any hearings. (This nonpartisan analysis of candidates, which every president since Dwight D. Eisenhower has used in considering nominees, was eliminated by George W. Bush.) Leahy is also likely to hold quick hearings for less controversial nominees and for nominees who are designated for courts with the greatest need before turning to the possible challenges. In this way, he can accumulate public support that he can later use in opposing the more conservative or controversial nominees. And he will probably not hold hearings for more than one nominee at a time--something that makes abundant sense but that the Republicans failed to do.

The prevailing view has been that nominees are presumed to be confirmable, unless senators or interest groups find something "wrong" with them. Some legal scholars have proposed the idea of requiring nominees to demonstrate why they should be confirmed, and there are signs that Leahy is open to this approach.

The Senate has an important role to play in evaluating and challenging individuals who are being appointed to a lifetime job of interpreting the Constitution. While Republicans are likely to cry "Bork!" whenever a nominee is criticized (even though the same Democratically controlled Congress that rejected Bork overwhelmingly confirmed Scalia), Democrats should not shy away from opposing any (and even many) of President Bush's nominees. Nor should they be tempted to give free passes to minority candidates if those candidates are too conservative. The Constitution says that the Senate will give its advice and consent on all nominations. Most Americans don't want a judiciary slanted sharply in either direction. We will soon see whether the new majority in the Senate has the guts and the ability to make a credible case to the American people that President Bush should not have the unilateral authority to shape the judicial branch in his conservative image.

At High Court, a Retirement Watch

Rehnquist, O'Connor Top List of Possibilities as Speculation on Replacement Grows
Charles Lane and Amy Goldstein

As the Supreme Court prepares to end its term this month, the White House, the Senate and interest groups across the ideological spectrum are preparing for the possibility that a member of the court might retire, with Chief Justice William H. Rehnquist's departure the most frequently mentioned scenario.

There is no direct evidence that Rehnquist, 76, or any other member of the court is planning to step down this year. Justice Sandra Day O'Connor, 71, recently dampened speculation about her departure, making an unusual announcement that she had "no plans" to leave. When Rehnquist was asked through the Supreme Court press office for a similar statement, he declined to comment.

Now that a Republican occupies the White House for the first time in eight years, however, court observers consider it more likely that Rehnquist or O'Connor, who were both longtime activists in Arizona Republican politics before being appointed to the court by Republican presidents, will step down sometime in the next few years.

"Make no mistake," said one longtime friend of the chief justice, Rehnquist would prefer to "return" his seat to a Republican president. But another justice recently told a friend there was no suggestion around the court that a departure is imminent.

Similarly, a lawyer who has regular contact with the White House counsel's office said, "I don't see the kind of frenzied activity by people who would be involved" in the administration if they knew a retirement were looming. In the past, many justices have directly or indirectly relayed their departure plans to the White House slightly before announcing them publicly, often at the end of the term.

Nonetheless, the thought of stepping down apparently has at least crossed Rehnquist's mind. When PBS interviewer Charlie Rose asked in February if he could imagine retiring, Rehnquist replied, "Sure."
Justice John Paul Stevens, 81, is older than Rehnquist and O'Connor, and he also was appointed by a Republican president, Gerald R. Ford, in 1975. But Stevens is not considered a likely candidate for retirement. He remains in vigorous health -- and, though still nominally a

Republican, has moved to the left in his years on the court. He dissented vigorously from last year's court decision, spearheaded by its most conservative members, to stop the Florida recount and effectively ensure Bush's victory.

There have been no changes in membership at the Supreme Court since Stephen G. Breyer replaced Harry Blackmun in the fall of 1994, creating the second-longest period of stability in the court's history and pent-up anxiety about when the next vacancy will occur.

In such an uncertain climate, the administration, Congress and advocacy groups are keenly sensitive to the opportunity President Bush will have to shape the court -- one of the presidency's most enduring powers. The White House and the Justice Department have been working for months to define the factors that would go into choosing a nominee, as well as beginning to sift through potential candidates.

"We are working hard to be prepared," said White House Counsel Alberto R. Gonzales, who oversees the selection process and is himself a potential choice. "Even during the transition we began thinking about possible nominees to the court."

On Capitol Hill, Republicans on the Senate Judiciary Committee have already begun "informal discussions and talks" about potential candidates, said Makan Delrahim, the committee's GOP staff director.

In the meantime, conservative and liberal advocacy groups have been working aggressively to try to influence the president's eventual choice -- and public opinion. Conservatives have been urging Bush not to back down from his campaign statements that the current justices he most admires are Antonin Scalia and Clarence Thomas, the members furthest to the right.

"We are looking to him to stay as close to that standard and as consistently close to that standard as he can," said Thomas L. Jipping, director of the judicial selection monitoring project of the Free Congress Foundation.

On the left, civil rights groups and women's organizations have been trying to stoke public fears that Bush's impact on the court could have dire consequences on issues ranging from abortion to education to affirmative action.

"If George W. Bush follows through on his promise to the right wing and nominates someone in the mode of Scalia and Thomas and Rehnquist, then there is going to be an epic battle," said Ralph Neas, president of People for the American Way.

The ideological skirmish that has broken out in Congress during the last month over Bush's initial nominees to lower federal courts is widely considered a prelude to the full-scale battle that a Supreme Court opening could create.

According to aides in the administration and on Capitol Hill, the cross pressures on the president in making his selection will be intense. On the one hand, the shift of the Senate this month to

Democratic control, analysts say, could hinder Bush's prospects for securing a replacement as conservative as Rehnquist. At the same time, the GOP's right wing is insistent that the president must not reduce conservative strength on the court by nominating anyone more liberal than Rehnquist.

"The difficulty is that the president has got to decide, 'How much political capital am I willing to bleed for a controversial Supreme Court nominee?' " said a conservative legal expert.

In such a contentious environment, names that have been considered among Judiciary Committee Republicans, sources said, include federal appeals court judges Emilio Garza, Edith H. Jones and J. Michael Luttig and the committee's ranking Republican, Sen. Orrin G. Hatch (Utah).

Other possibilities the president might favor, a variety of sources say, include conservative appeals court judges J. Harvie Wilkinson and Frank H. Easterbrook and Washington lawyers John G. Roberts and Miguel Estrada, both nominated by Bush last month to the federal appeals court here.

Bush also could look to members of Congress, such as Sen. Jon Kyl (R-Ariz.) or Rep. Christopher Cox (R-Calif.), who was being considered by the White House this spring for an appeals court seat but withdrew from consideration because of opposition from California's Democratic senators.

Administration officials declined to confirm any candidates they are contemplating. Bush has indicated he would like to nominate the first Hispanic justice, a move that might help him woo Latino voters in 2004 and improve his chances of winning confirmation in the Senate. In that context, Gonzales, a former justice on the Texas Supreme Court and a confidant of Bush's, is considered a prime candidate.

Asked whether he might accept a nomination, Gonzales said: "I am asked this question a lot. I typically say I don't intend to be a candidate. . . . My focus is working here, serving this president in this capacity."

Some conservatives consider Gonzales too moderate, and others view him as lacking the experience to become chief justice. To allay such concerns, Bush could make a double switch, nominating a current member of the court -- perhaps O'Connor --to replace the chief justice and naming Gonzales an associate justice.

"Politically, nothing beats that pair," said a lawyer who knows several of the justices personally.

Rehnquist's departure would not be as politically momentous as that of O'Connor, who is a swing vote on the closely divided court. Rehnquist is a consistent conservative, so the prospect of an equally conservative Bush-nominated successor for him would merely reinforce the existing ideological mix.

"If O'Connor is stepping down, then there will be all these arguments . . . about the balance of the court," said Terry Eastland, publisher of the conservative Weekly Standard and a senior Justice Department official in the Reagan administration. "With Rehnquist, the Democrats might be more willing to defer to the president in terms of judicial philosophy."

By regaining control of the Senate, the Democrats now run the Judiciary Committee, which will largely determine how quickly a nomination is processed -- and how much the nominee is grilled about his or her judicial philosophy.

Some Senate Democrats have begun discussing whether they would even employ a filibuster or other procedural tactics to block a Bush appointee from being voted on by the full Senate -- a sharp departure from past practice. In 1987, Robert H. Bork was allowed a vote on the Senate floor, even after the Democratic-controlled Judiciary Committee rejected him. Bork lost the floor vote, 58 to 42.

Rehnquist has been on the court since 1972, when he became an associate justice under President Richard M. Nixon. President Ronald Reagan elevated Rehnquist to chief justice in 1986, to replace the retiring Warren E. Burger.

In a recent interview with Fox News, Rehnquist said he had thought of departing before he was tapped to be chief justice. He acknowledged he has been having trouble lately remembering names and sent this wistful message to his television audience: "I'll tell them this, that I just think I've been extraordinarily fortunate in my life, and I'm very grateful for my good fortune."

Rehnquist's health, particularly severe back pain, has been a problem in the past. Although he still must rise from the bench and stretch his back during the court's two-hour oral argument sessions, he now appears to be in good physical and mental condition.

Under Rehnquist, a five-member conservative majority on the court has moved the law in a decidedly conservative direction, trimming affirmative action, clearing legal obstacles to the application of capital punishment, and limiting federal authority over the states.

Asked during the PBS interview if it would make a difference to him that there is a Republican in the White House, Rehnquist did not answer directly but did concede that there had "traditionally" been a "slight preference" by justices to retire during administrations of the party that appointed them.

Daschle's 'Intensive Care Unit' to Attend to Patients' Rights

John Lancaster and Helen Dewar

 EXCERPT ***

POWER PLAY: The Senate has once again gone into overtime in trying to nail down the fine points of its shifting power balance, delaying approval of a new resolution on committee organization because of an unresolved dispute over the handling of judicial nominations.

Without an agreement, freshman senators are left without committee assignments, many Democratic committee chairmen have to operate with Republican majorities -- and President Bush will have to wait awhile longer for action on his nominees.

The reason is that the power-sharing agreement negotiated when the Senate was evenly divided lapsed when Democrats took control this month, meaning that committee organization reverts to what it was at the end of the 106th Congress -- until a new agreement is reached.

After two weeks of quiet, behind-the-scenes negotiations, Republicans went public last week with demands for a guarantee that Supreme Court nominees will come to the Senate floor for a vote and for public disclosure when nominees are blocked by their home-state senators under the "blue slip" process. They said they asked Majority Leader Daschle to put the two proposals to a vote by the Senate, and he refused.

Later, Daschle issued a statement saying he has made both public and private commitments to "assuring a fair process for judicial nominees" and wants to resolve remaining organizational issues "through negotiations and discussions, rather than with potentially divisive votes."

On a party-line vote, which is customary on votes related to party powers, the GOP proposals would be defeated 51-49. But Republicans could claim a moral high ground in favor of full disclosure and fair treatment for a new president's nominees.

Senate Majority Leader Tom Daschle on Judicial Nominations
Tony Snow, Juan Williams

WILLIAMS: Senator Daschle, since Mr. Jeffords has come over, at least for caucus purposes, with the Democrats, there's been no reorganization of the Senate. So I'm wondering, how are you operating? And what pressures are there on you, as the Senate majority leader, to in fact now reach some deal with the Republicans so that you can get back to business?

DASCHLE: Well, Juan, I've told my Republican colleagues that I'm not going to jam them, I'm going to give them time to sort this out. These transitions are never easy. It took Senator Lott and I a couple of months to work out power-sharing.

But this is nothing compared to what we had to work through with power-sharing. That was unprecedented. The circumstances now are certainly not unprecedented, and we went through a lot of the same types of questions in the 1950s. Ao this is really a matter of whether we have the one-vote majority in committees, whether or not we revert back to power-sharing if something would change, whether or not we can work (Publication page references are not available for this document.) out staff and budgets. I think we can, and I think we're getting closer.

WILLIAMS: Well, now, what about the pressure coming from the GOP to say, listen, we want some assurances, we want them written down, and, in specific, concern about judicial nominations and the fact that they not get bottled up in committee but be able to reach to the Senate floor for a full vote?

DASCHLE: Well, I have said over and over that we're going to be fair. We are determined not to engage in any payback. We're not going to do what we think in many cases was done to our nominees in the last eight years. That isn't what we're all about.

What we want to do is move forward, assure that there are votes. But we don't want to abrogate the constitutional process of advice and consent, to make sure, absolutely certain that the judiciary committee has the prerogative and has the responsibility that it's been charged to take on. And that's what this is about.

SNOW: But, Senator, the constitutional obligation is for the entire Senate, it's not the Senate Judiciary Committee. And the founders never said, well, we want the Judicial Committee to decide who gets to serve as judges.

What have you told Republicans, other than that you'd be fair? Specifically, what have you promised them?

DASCHLE: Well, what I've promised them, Tony, is that we were going to assure them that every nominee, regardless of whether it's judiciary or executive, will have a fair hearing, will have an opportunity to be considered, and I can't go any further than that.

Obviously, we don't want to see happen what happened over the last five years, where some judges were kept without even the opportunity to be heard for over four years; where some senators, because you had secret holds, were given no opportunity to have the right to be considered and to be voted on. We're not going to do that. I don't think we should do that.

But I'm not going to engage or commit to an extralegal process that says, in some cases, regardless of what the Judiciary Committee does, we're going to bypass the committee and go straight to the floor.

SNOW: Why not? That's the agreement you just had.

REV_00127637

DASCHLE: No, no, I don't think we've ever had an agreement of that kind.

SNOW: Did you not have an agreement that, when you had the 50-50 power-sharing agreement, that nominations would go to the Senate floor?

DASCHLE: No, what we had was an agreement that either the majority or the minority leader could make a motion to proceed to a nomination. And I obviously would be willing to look at something like that. But never did we have an automatic commitment that any nominee or any bill would come straight to the floor.

Senator Joe Biden on Judicial Nominations

Tim Russert

MR. RUSSERT: You're also a member of the Senate Judiciary Committee.

SEN. BIDEN: I am.

MR. RUSSERT: Harry Reid, Democratic senator from Nevada and a colleague of yours, said the other day, talking about the Supreme Court: "We may wind up with another Scalia. Even though I disagree with the result of some of his opinions, his ability to reason is about as good as I've ever seen. I'm not looking for another Antonin Scalia, but I think that he brings with him such an intriguing background and such a brilliant ability to reason, that if we had someone like him, it would be a tougher decision for the Senate."

SEN. BIDEN: Wouldn't be tough for me at all. I've spoken to Justice Scalia. I consider us good acquaintances. So we kid each other occasionally when he--like, for example, I got a note or a call, I can't recall which, saying when the special prosecutor thing was--when we all voted against it, you know, reinstating, he called and says, "See, I was right the first time in the Morrison vs. Olson case."

I teach constitutional law--he called me and said, "I better come up and help you with those students. They're getting the wrong idea." As I've said to him, bluntly, I regret--the two most regrettable decisions I made were voting for him and voting for Reagan's tax cut.

MR. RUSSERT: Scalia was confirmed 98-to-nothing.

SEN. BIDEN: No--he was, but you--remember the context then? The context was we had a governor named Mario Cuomo saying he'd kick anybody's rear-end who didn't vote for the Italian. And, you know, remember he didn't answer any questions and no one forced him to answer any questions. Look, the fact that someone is brilliant does not qualify them to be on the Supreme Court. They can be brilliant and wrong. I would like--for example, I think it's important there is a Scalia on the court. I'd like another Brennan on the court, as well. But if you want someone who's brilliant in his reasoning, equally as consequential, I'd take Souter. He's equally as bright as Scalia. Writes better than...

MR. RUSSERT: As chief justice.

SEN. BIDEN: As chief justice.

MR. RUSSERT: You don't believe the Democrats would ever support Scalia to be chief justice of the Supreme Court?

SEN. BIDEN: I'm not speaking to the Democrats. I'm speaking for me. His view of the Constitution, that there are no unenumerated rights in the Constitution, that there's a very--this is the most activist Supreme Court we've had in the history of the United States of America, Tim. They have--they're the only court that has ever declared unconstitutional seven national pieces of legislation. People don't know. They declared, for example, the Older Americans Act unconstitutional as it applies to states.

MR. RUSSERT: But doesn't George Bush have a right to have conservatives on the Supreme Court?

SEN. BIDEN: Sure, he does. And I have a right to have who I want. This is what they call, you know, co-equal branches of government.

MR. RUSSERT: A liberal litmus test?

SEN. BIDEN: No, no. No, no, no. You're putting words in my mouth. You said, "Does he have a right to have conservatives?" To the degree that he pushes to the right, I can push to the center or to the left. The Constitution says that the United States Senate gets to determine--he gets to pick, his is to propose, ours is to dispose. We have from Rutledge back in the turn of the century with George Washington straight on through. We've rejected people whose views we believe are out of sync with what the Senate is.

I was asked advice by President Clinton when he had a chance to put people on the court. I went down to see him. I said, "Mr. President, when there's a divided government, you should pick someone in the middle. You should understand that." And he did. My advice to the president of the United States is if he wants a holy war, he can do that and pick another Scalia. But there's a divided government. The nation is divided on these issues. He should pick someone who is a centrist. He can be center right, but to pick someone on the extreme left or right would be a serious mistake, in my opinion.

Two Superior Judges Merit Confirmation

Jim Petro, Ohio State Auditor (Editorial)

During the 2000 presidential campaign, President Bush promised that he would nominate for federal judgeships only people of the highest integrity and professional competence and who possess the proper judicial temperament. Recently, Bush began delivering on that promise by nominating 11 men and women from across the country from both political parties for seats on the various federal courts of appeal.

Ohioans should be proud that for the first two of seven vacancies on the 6th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals, which covers Ohio, Michigan, Kentucky and Tennessee, the president nominated two outstanding Ohioans to serve on that bench: Ohio Supreme Court Justice Deborah L. Cook and former state solicitor Jeffrey S. Sutton.

As former assistant prosecutor, city law director in Rocky River and lawyer in private practice for the past 28 years, it has been my pleasure and privilege to have appeared before and practiced with thousands of judges and attorneys throughout the state. Without a doubt, Cook and Sutton are among the best-qualified lawyers to serve in the federal judiciary that I have seen in my legal career.

After a distinguished 13-year career in private practice in Akron, Cook joined the Ohio Court of Appeals in 1991, where she quickly developed an excellent reputation for her hard work and for the quality of her opinions. Elected and re-elected to the Ohio Supreme Court in 1994 and 2000, Cook has been praised by The Dispatch for her "keen intellect" and "careful legal scholarship."

The newspaper noted that she applies the law "without fear or favor" in crafting rulings that are governed by the Constitution and not by popularity polls or special interests.

Sutton graduated first in his class at Ohio State University Law School and served as a law clerk for two different U.S. Supreme Court justices, a rare honor. As Ohio's state solicitor, he was responsible for arguing cases of the utmost importance to Ohioans before both the Ohio and the U.S. Supreme Courts.

A prolific legal scholar, Sutton has written more than 50 law review articles and two legal texts. While keeping his private practice in Columbus, he also is teaching constitutional law at OSU law school.

When Bush submitted his nominees for the federal appeals courts to the U.S. Senate for confirmation, he called upon senators of both parties to restore civility and dignity to the confirmation process, and, most importantly, he asked for a prompt vote on each nominee.

Right now the court, based in Cincinnati, is critically short of judges to handle an ever-expanding caseload. Because of their impeccable credentials, Cook and Sutton should be swiftly confirmed.

Lack of News Makes Pontificating Difficult but Not Impossible

Joe Hallett, Dispatch Politics Editor

A big patch of white space, a fast-closing deadline and an empty head. Mid- June and the dog days are here already. Will loyal readers -- both of them -- notice if there is no column this week? Can't do commentary without some news. It's plain dead around here.

Speaking of death, maybe column grist could be ground from the pending U.S. Supreme Court case on whether mentally ill murderers should be executed. But what's the point now? We already killed schizophrenic Jay D. Scott.

The legal system, though, is always column fodder, and it would be timely to discuss President Bush's nomination of Columbus attorney Jeffrey Sutton to the 6th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals in Cincinnati.

But that has to do more with the political system, and editors are always griping that readers don't care about politics. Why waste a column on it? So what if the new Democratic majority in the U.S. Senate, for its own partisan aggrandizement, stands ready to ravage Sutton's reputation?

So what if the Democrats are salivating to tar Sutton unfairly as an uncompassionate conservative for having the audacity to argue successfully before the U.S. Supreme Court that the Constitution limits the ability of citizens to sue state governments for discrimination against the disabled?

Does anyone think for a moment that Senate Democrats will care that Sutton, at age 40, suffers from osteoarthritis, a degenerative disease that eventually would have put him in a wheelchair, if not for the miracle of hip- replacement surgery?

Will Senate Democrats give a hoot that Sutton, a brilliant attorney by virtually everyone's account, has a history of performing free legal work for social causes and groups? He has argued, pro bono, on behalf of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People, the Anti-Defamation League of B'nai B'rith, the Center for the Prevention of Handgun Violence and the American Civil Liberties Union.

Not long ago, Sutton took up the cause of a Chillicothe prison inmate and won a 9-0 decision from the U.S. Supreme Court, the ninth case in five years he had argued before the high court, probably more than any other private attorney.

Senate Democrats won't care. They're bent on getting back at Republicans for confirming only 61 percent of President Clinton's judicial nominees. When and if the Democrats give Sutton a hearing, they'll be more concerned about placating the constituencies who larder their coffers than putting a fair, honest person on the federal bench.

In a hearing process that too often has turned well-meaning nominees from both parties into bitter and spiteful judges -- Supreme Court Justice Clarence Thomas comes to mind --Sutton will be put through the political wringer, used and abused, to signal Bush that his Supreme Court nominees can expect even tougher treatment.

But, heck, nobody is interested in such political shenanigans except for maybe both readers of this column.

Well, then, there is the school-funding case. The Ohio Supreme Court will hear arguments Wednesday. For a third time, the court is expected to rule 4-3 that the legislature and governor failed to ensure an adequate and equitable education for Ohio's schoolchildren.

Lawyers for the state hope to turn one of two Republican justices, Paul E. Pfeifer or Andrew Douglas, who formed the majority with two Democrats in the previous decisions. A victory for the financially insatiable coalition of schools almost certainly will mean higher taxes.

The school-funding case has been around for 10 years. Yesterday's news is boring.

Oh, yeah, there's the Big Three Republican feud at the Statehouse. But that, too, is insider politics. Speaker Larry Householder of Glenford and Senate President Richard H. Finan of Cincinnati had their way with Gov. Bob Taft on the state budget and now they are poised to embarrass the governor by overriding some of his 49 vetoes.

Obviously, Taft's re-election in 2002 is not a high priority for Republicans controlling the General Assembly. For that matter, it appears not to be a high priority for Taft. While getting pushed around by legislative Republicans, he declined to use the bully pulpit to defend his own reasonable budget proposal, one that would not have gutted higher education.

Taft may have trouble telling voters what he stands for next year. But that's then and this is now, and there is nothing going on.

Unless, of course, anyone considers the latest scandal at the Ohio Department of Job and Family

Services worthy of comment. News flash: Department illegally withholds more child-support payments from poor children. Routine stuff.

Maybe a column could be crafted around the big-money push at the Statehouse to permit video-gambling machines at Ohio's seven horse racetracks. But thanks to Taft, that's dead for the moment. Maybe something could be written about all the wacko legislation that right-wingers in the House want to pass. But why dignify wackiness?

My gosh, look at the time! All this white space to fill and nothing to write. Will somebody please make some news around here?

Heat Turned Up High in Judicial Kitchen

Russ Pulliam

He's been there, done that.

Federal Judge Daniel Manion recommends a thick skin and some experience in rough-and-tumble political battles for potentially controversial judicial nominees. President Bush already has submitted some nominations for federal court positions for U.S. Senate confirmation. But the big battle is yet to come with an anticipated opening on the U.S. Supreme Court in the next year or so.

When Manion was nominated by President Ronald Reagan for the 7th Circuit Court of Appeals in 1986, the mild-mannered former state senator from South Bend was surprised to become the center of controversy. The Manion battle was a warm-up for bigger ones over subsequent nominations of Robert Bork and Clarence Thomas for the Supreme Court.

Manion was blasted by People for the American Way and Senate Democrats for being unqualified for the court position. Sen. Edward Kennedy called him "the least-qualified" nominee he had ever seen for the federal appeals court. His critics found fault with his proof-reading because of errors in his correspondence.

Yet Manion also attracted endorsements from liberal Democrats who knew him back in Indiana. He made it to the bench after close votes in the Senate.

Manion understood that his critics weren't aiming the mud-slinging at him personally. What they really objected to was his willingness to look to the original intent of the Constitution. But he worries that mud-slinging campaigns that got worse under Bork and Thomas could deter qualified people from serving on the courts.

"I had a much thicker skin politically," he said in a recent interview. "I understood what was going on."

Good lawyers can make more money in private practice. "Why should I subject myself to this kind of attack?" he can hear potential candidates say. "I don't need to have my name dragged through the mud. Who knows what they'll come up with -- what kind of magazines you subscribe to. That's the kind of drivel it descends to," Manion added.

Critics might suggest that those who can't stand the heat should stay out of the judicial kitchen. But the judicial branch traditionally has been set above the partisan politics of the legislative and executive branches. Until the Bork-Thomas controversies, a long tradition was to evaluate court nominees on the basis of competence and personal character.

Manion has had the last word with the critics who attacked his alleged incompetence. "He made a liar out of them," commented a court colleague, William Bauer. "He is very bright, hard-working, thoughtful. Our job is to make sure we follow the Constitution. That's what he does very well."

Another Indiana lawyer, Peter Rusthoven, was associate counsel during the Reagan administration and gained an insider's perspective on the court nomination process. He suggests that more ideological battles over these nominations will undermine confidence in the courts as impartial decision-makers.

"Judicial nominations are no longer about, is this person smart, well-trained in the law, hard-working," he said. "Instead, you're nominating a person who is going to have one vote in a super-legislature, and that super-legislature is going to decide all kinds of things that the courts traditionally never decided."

With activist judges "writing" laws, the executive and legislative branches lose their chance to settle controversial political and social issues. Rusthoven is hoping for more strict constructionist judges who will be willing to defer issues back to the legislative branch when no clear constitutional issues are at stake.

He points to the 1857 Dred Scott decision as a notorious example of judicial activism, with the court taking over the slavery issue by ruling that blacks were not citizens. "It severely minimized the possibility of working out the slavery issue in the elected or political branches of government," he said. "It took away from the Congress the ability to regulate slavery in the territories."

The Senate ought to give Bush the green light to nominate strict-constructionist judges for the high court. A few more of them could help take the court out of some of the controversial political issues that are better left to the two elected branches of government.

Reason to Reject

Elizabeth Cavendish, Legal Director, NARAL

We take exception to the belief that it is unfair to challenge the qualifications of judicial nominee John G. Roberts Jr. based upon antiabortion briefs he filed as a government lawyer [editorial, June 7].

Mr. Roberts was a political appointee in the Reagan administration and served as principal deputy solicitor general for President Bush from 1989 to 1993. He competed for the job knowing that the administration had the goal of rescinding the constitutional right of reproductive choice.

During the Reagan and Bush era, the Justice Department argued to restrict or overturn the fundamental right to choose eight times in seven Supreme Court cases. Mr. Roberts helped author the brief in Rust v. Sullivan, defending the now-repealed "gag rule" that prohibits family planning providers from informing women of all their options when confronting an unwanted pregnancy. Saying the Roberts brief argued "in passing" for the overturn of Roe, as the editorial did, suggests it is inconsequential to urge that constitutional rights be repealed. Would The Post make the same argument about efforts to reverse Brown v. Board of Education?

In Bray v. Alexandria Women's Health Clinic, Mr. Roberts, on behalf of the Bush Justice Department, intervened as a friend of the court. The government's friendship was extended to Operation Rescue, which was terrorizing women who were trying to enter reproductive health facilities. Mr. Roberts argued that the nation's civil rights laws should be narrowly interpreted to preclude relief for women seeking constitutionally protected health services. Congress disagreed and the following year enacted the Freedom of Access to Clinic Entrances Act.

No one has an entitlement to a lifetime slot on the federal judiciary. The burden is on the nominee to demonstrate that he or she deserves Senate confirmation. This high threshold is essential to ensure that the judiciary will continue to guard our liberties against assault.

G.O.P. Reports an 'Impasse' Over Senate Reorganization
Alison Mitchell

Senior Senate Republicans said today that they had hit an impasse in talks with the new Democratic majority leader over organizing the Senate because of disputes about how to handle judicial nominees. They called for the issues in contention to be brought to the full Senate floor for a vote.

After two weeks of talks with Senator Tom Daschle of South Dakota, the new majority leader, the five Republican negotiators went public with their complaints this evening as the Senate was shutting down for the week.

"We are reluctantly here to announce we are at impasse at the moment," said Senator Mitch McConnell, Republican of Kentucky.

The Republican senators said they had reached agreement with the Democrats on essential details like the size and makeup of committees. But they said they wanted the resolution needed to organize the Senate under Democratic control to contain an assurance that all nominees for the Supreme Court would come before the full Senate for a vote.

They said they also wanted the resolution to require that if any senator exercised the right under Senate tradition to block a home-state judicial nominee, the action must be revealed to the public. Senator Phil Gramm, Republican of Texas, called such disclosure a "good government, sunshine provision."

The Republicans handed out a report showing that since at least the 1880's, the Judiciary Committee had sent to the floor even those Supreme Court nominations that were opposed by a committee majority.

Mr. Daschle said in a statement that he would continue to try to resolve the outstanding issues "through negotiations and discussions rather than potentially divisive votes. "He said he had "stated publicly and privately my commitment to assuring a fair process for judicial nominees."

But he has resisted setting down any formal procedure. One Democratic Senate aide said that a "subtle distinction but an important distinction" existed between a guarantee that the Judiciary Committee would send a Supreme Court nominee to the full Senate and an informal tradition of doing so. "It would be an unprecedented new grant of authority to the minority party," the aide said.

The issue of judicial candidates and the ideological direction of the federal courts is one of the most delicate areas of dispute between the parties. During the six years that the Republicans controlled the Senate and Bill Clinton was president, the Republicans offered neither of the guarantees to the Democrats that they are now seeking.

But they say they have been disturbed by vows by some Democrats to stop conservative judges. And they say they would be willing to make the two provisions they are seeking permanent no matter which party has control of the Senate.

Senator Patrick Leahy of Vermont, the new Judiciary chairman, issued a statement saying: "There is more than a little irony in the charge from some Republican quarters that the Democratic Senate will treat President Bush's judicial nominees unfairly. Some Republicans seem to be expecting in Democrats the same wiles that the G.O.P. Senate used in killing so many of President Clinton's nominees."

If the Senate held a vote on the two issues, the Republicans would probably not prevail. But the vote would put the Democrats in the politically embarrassing position of opposing public disclosure and looking like they were ready to block President Bush's Supreme Court picks.

When the Senate switched last week to Democratic control with Senator James M. Jeffords of Vermont becoming an independent, Mr. Daschle became majority leader and Democrats became committee chairmen. But many of the details of the changeover need to be approved by a vote.

Mr. Daschle hinted today that a long stalemate could be a problem for Mr. Bush. "What that means is action in the committees on virtually anything is unlikely," he said. "We wouldn't be able to do nominations or legislation because obviously you don't have the full complement of membership on those committees."

Bush's Judgeships Stall in the Senate

Dave Boyer

Senate Republican negotiators late yesterday declared an impasse in their talks with Democrats on President Bush´s judicial nominees and said it was time to move forward with an up-or-down vote on the new Senate organization.

"We are only asking for fairness," said Sen. Mitch McConnell, Kentucky Republican. The negotiators said the next move is up to Senate Majority Leader Tom Daschle, South Dakota Democrat, on whether to call a vote.

Republicans want the resolution to reflect the three points on which both parties agree, and the two contentious matters voted on independently as amendments to the resolution.

Republicans said the full Senate should have the opportunity to make a determination and that they would not filibuster if the resolution is voted down.

"We´re simply asking for there to be a vote. When we have fundamental differences, we vote," said Sen. Arlen Specter, Pennsylvania Republican. Both parties agree Democrats will have a one-seat majority on every committee, with the exception of the Ethics Committee, which by tradition is equally divided.

All committee members will retain their assignments, and committee funding and space agreements negotiated by the chairmen and ranking members will remain in effect. Democrats do not agree with Republicans that "blue slips," or single-senator veto slips on judges from home-state senators, should be eliminated.

Democratic leaders turned up the pressure yesterday on judgeships, accusing the GOP of holding up White House nominations by not submitting to the Democrats´ proposal to reorganize the Senate.

"They´re making my life easier," said Sen. Patrick J. Leahy, Vermont Democrat and chairman of the Senate Judiciary Committee. "For the life of me, I don´t know why they keep waiting. I´m ready to start (confirmation hearings) within 10 days to two weeks of the time that we reorganize."

Republicans say Mr. Leahy, one of the party's most liberal lawmakers, is a prime example of why they are pressing Mr. Daschle for assurances that Mr. Bush's nominees will be treated fairly. Mr. Leahy was one of the most outspoken critics of John Ashcroft's nomination for attorney general in a bruising confirmation hearing in January.

In two weeks of talks, Mr. Daschle has resisted Republican requests to promise floor votes on appeals court candidates and Supreme Court nominees if the Judiciary Committee rejects them. Mr. Daschle says he will hold up a deal to reorganize committees with Democratic majorities until both sides agree on the issue of nominations.

Democrats say Senate Republicans are only hurting their own administration by not accepting Democrats' more vague, nonbinding assurance to be fair to nominees. "Unfortunately, what that means is that action in the committees on virtually anything is unlikely," Mr. Daschle said yesterday.

"We wouldn't be able to do nominations or legislation. We're going to ... probably be faced with a bottled-up array of , but we won't be able to do that." Asked if he is "jamming" the White House's agenda, Mr. Daschle replied, "That's not my choice. I think it would be inexcusable for us to disenfranchise elected members of the Senate who were serving on these committees just a week ago, and now to tell them they can't vote. That isn't my jamming them, that is simply a reality; that's what senators are here to do, is to make decisions."

Referring to the new majority party's power to investigate the administration, Mr. Daschle added, "In the meantime, we'll be satisfied, I suppose, with the opportunities to hold oversight hearings and other kinds of hearings. ..." For example, Sen. Joseph I. Lieberman, Connecticut Democrat, has used his new chairmanship of the Governmental Affairs Committee to hold a hearing on the administration's refusal to set energy price caps in California. Mr. Lieberman, who lost his bid for the vice presidency last year and is considered a likely presidential candidate for 2004, also plans to hold hearings on Mr. Bush's environmental policies.

Reception President Bush's Federal Judge Nominees Face From The Democratic-Controlled Senate

Bob Edwards, Anchor; Nina Totenburg, Reporting

This is MORNING EDITION from NPR News. I'm Bob Edwards.

For six years, Democrats fumed when President Clinton's judicial nominees were stalled

by the Republican-controlled Senate. But the tables have been turned. Now there's a Republican president and a Democratic Senate. NPR legal affairs correspondent Nina Totenberg reports on what this could mean for President Bush's nominees.

NINA TOTENBERG reporting:

About 1/8th of the federal judiciary is vacant. But while 70 of the 102 vacancies are in the trial courts, President Bush has made just two nominations to fill those slots. Instead, the administration is concentrating on filling the 32 appeals court vacancies. The president has already sent the Senate names for half of those slots. There's a reason for that. The appeals courts are just one step below the Supreme Court, and these are the judges that are the final word in most of the cases heard across the country. Moreover, they are widely considered training grounds for the Supreme Court.

Indeed, it was the Clinton nominees for the appellate courts who were most ferociously stalled by the GOP in years gone by. The numbers tell the tale. Although Presidents Clinton and Reagan won confirmation for roughly equal numbers of judges in their two terms, Mr. Reagan won confirmation of 87 percent of his appeals court nominees, while Mr. Clinton won confirmation of only 61 percent, leaving the rest dangling without action.

In the last two years of the Clinton presidency, 17 appeals court nominees never got a hearing. Those who were confirmed waited, on average, more than a year. Contrast that with the wait for President Reagan's nominees in his last two years when the Democrats controlled the Senate, 17 weeks, and for the first President Bush's nominees, 15 weeks. The result is that now, after eight years of a Democratic administration, Republican appointees still dominate the influential appeals courts. President Bush wants to add to that advantage, and as Democrats see it, he has front-loaded the nomination process, concentrating his early judicial nominations in the appeals court. Senator Patrick Leahy, the Democratic chairman of the Senate Judiciary Committee, having served with six presidents, has this perspective.

Senator PATRICK LEAHY (Chairman, Senate Judiciary Committee): Presidents serve for no more than eight years; judges serve for a lifetime. And I think the Senate has a real responsibility to make sure that we have an independent judiciary, one that doesn't lurch to the right or the left.

TOTENBERG: And Leahy insists he will be fair.

Sen. LEAHY: I've talked with a number of Republican senators, and some have told me very frankly they were totally unfair to President Clinton and they're wondering if I'm going to do the same thing to them. I'm not. I'm not going to go for some kind of a payback.

TOTENBERG: Not surprisingly, the Republicans aren't taking those assurances at face value. A new group has sprung up, billing itself as bipartisan, and it's running ads, so far in just one state, South Dakota, which just happens to be the home of the Democratic Senate majority leader, Tom Daschle.

(Soundbite of advertisement)

Unidentified Woman: Our legal system affects us all. Every day courts make decisions that impact our families. That's why President Bush supports commonsense judges with character, experience and intellect.

TOTENBERG: Oklahoma Governor Frank Keating, a Republican, is chairman of the sponsoring group, Citizens for Common Sense Courts.

Governor FRANK KEATING (Republican, Oklahoma): The judiciary shouldn't be an arm of either party. Let's fairly get judges considered and confirmed.

TOTENBERG: But while Keating's group bills itself as bipartisan, the Democratic featured most prominently in its literature, former Democratic Attorney General Griffin Bell, says he is, in fact, not part of the group, that he declined to join, and yesterday the group retracted his name. That's not to say that Republican fears are unfounded. Liberal groups are already lining up to oppose a significant number of President Bush's judicial nominees. Nan Aron is director of the Alliance for Justice, an umbrella group of civil rights, environmental and consumer organizations.

Ms. NAN ARON (Alliance for Justice): We have grave doubts about most of the candidates nominated by President Bush. They were chosen by this president specifically because, while they may be very qualified and have excellent records on the law, they have shown by their actions or writings a real hostility to the gains made by women, minorities, and hostility to the role that government plays in improving the lives of Americans.

TOTENBERG: And specific groups have targeted specific nominees. Americans United for Separation of Church and State is opposing University of Utah Professor Michael McConnell, a respective conservative scholar who's long argued for greater accommodation between church and state. Also opposed to McConnell is the National Abortion Rights Action League, which cites his strong opposition to Roe vs. Wade. In addition, NARAL is also fighting the appeals court nomination of John Roberts, who, when he served as deputy solicitor general in the first Bush administration, wrote a brief that argued against federally funded clinics allowing doctors to discuss abortion with their patients. In that brief, Roberts contended that Roe vs. Wade should be reversed, a position he was quizzed about by Justice Harry Blackmun in a later case that he argued involving abortion clinics.

(Soundbite of interview)

Justice HARRY BLACKMUN: Mr. Roberts, in this case, are you asking that Roe vs. Wade by overruled?

Mr. JOHN ROBERTS: No, Your Honor. The issue doesn't even come up.

Justice BLACKMUN: Well, that hasn't prevented the solicitor general from taking that position

in prior cases.

TOTENBERG: But Walter Dellinger, who served as solicitor general in the Clinton administration, says it's very risky to judge judicial nominees by the positions they've taken as government lawyers.

Mr. WALTER DELLINGER (Former Solicitor General, Clinton Administration): The kind of arguments that John Roberts was making in the position of deputy solicitor general were the kind that a professional lawyer's expected to make when his client, the chief executive of which is the president of the United States, has run on those positions. I'm afraid that this is a process that will lead to the rejection of the most qualified of the nominees; that is, those who, like Roberts, have been out and have had a major lifetime of accomplishment.

TOTENBERG: Elizabeth Cavendish, the legal director of NARAL, disagrees.

Ms. ELIZABETH CAVENDISH (Legal Director, NARAL): He was aligned personally with these decisions. Again, he was a political appointee, and this was a signature position of the first Bush administration.

TOTENBERG: There's an irony in NARAL's position. Liberal groups were outraged when conservatives opposed some Clinton appointees because of positions they took as lawyers. I pressed the point on Cavendish. So you would say that those who are anti-abortion would be completely correct in voting their ideas and proposing pro-choice nominees.

Ms. CAVENDISH: It doesn't work both ways. The other side wants to turn back the clock on women's rights and roll back a fundamental right.

TOTENBERG: Just what will happen to the Roberts and McConnell nominations and others is unclear. When the Republicans controlled the Senate, those nominees had been slated for quick hearings. With the Democrats in control now, though, the first hearing is likely to be for Roger Gregory, an African-American from Virginia appointed by President Clinton to sit on an interim basis for a year on the 4th Circuit Court of Appeals. President Bush reappointed Gregory. Chairman Leahy says he intends to begin confirmation hearings in less than two weeks, but by tradition only one appeals court nominee is considered at a time, and historically there's an average of about one confirmation hearing a month.

With only three months left scheduled in this legislative session this year, that would mean three or four appeals court nominees possibly confirmed this year. Even that could be in doubt. North Carolina Republican Senator Jesse Helms blocked all of President Clinton's North Carolina nominees to the 4th Circuit, and nobody's quite sure what he will do about the Gregory nomination when it gets to the Senate floor, where he could put a so-called hold on it and send it into limbo.

Moreover, all confirmation hearings are on hold for the moment, because the Senate Democrats and Republicans have not agreed to a reorganizing plan in the aftermath of the Democratic takeover. The Republicans are seeking something that no Senate minority has ever had before: a guarantee that all the president's nominees will get a floor vote. Few observers believe the Republicans will get such an unprecedented guarantee, because the current stalemate is perfectly acceptable to the Democrats. If the Senate organization agreement is not forthcoming, it means simply that no nominations will move at all. Nina Totenberg, NPR News, Washington.

Republicans Seeking to Secure Votes on Judicial Nominees

Jesse J. Holland

Republicans backed down on Thursday from some of their demands for how the newly Democrat-controlled Senate should handle President Bush's nominees for the Supreme Court and federal judgeships.

Earlier in the week, GOP negotiators demanded guaranteed Senate votes on all Supreme Court and federal appellate court nominees, and elimination of the secret veto process for some judicial nominations.

After Democrats refused, Republicans sought to allow the full Senate - instead of negotiators - to decide whether the Supreme Court nominees should be guaranteed a vote. They also want the Senate to decide whether to make the senatorial veto process public instead of private, as it has been in the past.

Democrats say they will treat Bush's nominees fairly. Republicans fear Democrats will block Bush's judicial nominations.

"We're not asking for there to be a commitment," said Sen. Arlen Specter, R-Pa., one of the five GOP senators who have been negotiating with Majority Leader Thomas Daschle, D-S.D. "We're asking for there to be a vote."

Daschle, who is trying to reorganize the Senate to reflect the Democratic takeover, is opposed.

"I remain committed to trying to resolve the outstanding issues around the organization of the Senate through negotiations and discussions, rather than with potentially divisive votes," Daschle said.

Democratic aides said the idea of making public the secret vetoes likely would come up a meeting Tuesday of Democratic senators.

The maneuvering is the result of Vermont Sen. Jim Jeffords' decision to leave the GOP and become an independent, altering the 50-50 split in the Senate. Republicans had control by virtue of Vice President Dick Cheney's tie-breaking vote.

The two sides agreed that Democrats will gain a one-seat majority on each Senate committee, and the size of committees will be expanded to accommodate the one-seat Democratic edge. All Republicans will keep their committee assignments, and committee funding and space agreements negotiated at the beginning of the year will stay in effect as well.

Sen. Orrin Hatch of Utah, the top Republican on the Judiciary Committee, said that while filibustering the reorganization had not been discussed, GOP senators told negotiators to "go to the wall" over the judges provision.

Daschle said that if Republicans and Democrats are unable to agree on a reorganization, "action in the committees on virtually anything is unlikely."

The Case for Borking

Randall Kennedy

As the battle over the federal judiciary heats up, progressives must convince the general public of a basic proposition: The judiciary is an inescapably political branch of government whose agents, the judges, should be viewed in much the same way other politicians are.

To say that the courts are political may seem so obvious as to be banal. There is, however, a deep and widespread impulse to deny the political character of the courts. An important manifestation of this denial arises in the context of selecting, confirming, or rejecting candidates for the federal bench.

Many people bemoan, for example, what they term the "politicization" of the judiciary (as if there existed a golden age when judicial selection and judicial decision making were uncontaminated by politics). Liberals and conservatives, Democrats and Republicans have taken turns accusing each other of indulging in this unpardonable sin.

Progressives, however, should get off that unproductive rhetorical merry-go-round, accept the ineradicable presence of politics in the judicial arena, and strive to shape the judiciary in such a way that it will produce good, sound, progressive rulings. That will entail, among other things, lobbying on behalf of jurists who will advance the progressive agenda and against those who will be hostile to it.

Article II of the U.S. Constitution empowers the president exclusively to nominate federal judges, while it imposes a check on presidential authority by making the seating of a nominee dependent on the Senate's "Advice and Consent." Whereas the president is armed with veto power over legislation, the Senate, in effect, has veto power over judicial nominations.

Over the course of the nation's history, the Senate has exercised that power over Supreme Court nominees 29 times (and over district and appeals court nominees many times more). In addition to objecting to nominees on grounds of incompetence, dishonesty, or some other personal failing, senators have also voted nay for political or ideological reasons.

Opponents blocked George Washington's Supreme Court nominee Judge John Rutledge because of Rutledge's opposition to the Jay Treaty (despite the fact that the Senate had already confirmed him for a previous opening on the Court and that he had just served for an entire Supreme Court term as the interim chief justice).

Ulysses S. Grant's nominee Attorney General Ebeneezer Rockwood Hoar was not confirmed because he had opposed President Andrew Johnson's impeachment.

Herbert Hoover's nominee Judge John Parker was blocked because of Parker's perceived hostility to organized labor and the advancement of African Americans. And Ronald Reagan's nominee Judge Robert Bork didn't make it because opponents feared, among other things, that he would energetically attack abortion rights.

In principle there is nothing wrong with political blocking, even if doing so stems entirely from one particular issue. Would we now condemn a senator who, prior to the Civil War, voted against a nominee solely on the grounds that the candidate favored slavery? I would hope not.

Yet many people sneer at the notion of litmus tests for purposes of judicial selection or confirmation--even as they unknowingly conduct such tests themselves.

Litmus tests of all sorts are scattered about the judicial-selection process. When senators ask a nominee whether he or she believes that the proper role of a judge is to interpret rather than make law, or whether the Eighth Amendment should be deemed to prohibit capital punishment--all the while silently insisting upon an expected formulaic reply--they are imposing a litmus test.

Today, a candidate would not be nominated, much less confirmed, if he or she failed to genuflect convincingly to Marbury v. Madison (which established the authority of the Supreme Court to invalidate an act of Congress deemed to be in conflict with the Constitution), Brown v. Board of Education (which invalidated de jure racial segregation in public primary and secondary schools), or other once-controversial decisions that have become so thoroughly a part of the conventional wisdom that we no longer even perceive reactions to them as litmus tests of acceptability.

Since senators (and the public as a whole) should feel free to object to a nominee on political grounds, they should also feel free to demand that nominees truthfully divulge thinking that bears upon relevant judicial matters. Nominees--both liberals and conservatives--often claim that they cannot answer certain questions because to do so would be to prejudge a matter that may come before them.

But that response is typically a mere dodge to avoid controversy. Senators need not accept this.

If a
candidate refuses to answer relevant questions, senators should take that refusal into consideration when determining whether to vote to confirm. It makes no sense to offer lifetime tenure and all the power of judicial review to candidates whose thinking about crucial matters is unknown.

A transparent process in which ideological objections to judicial candidates are candidly voiced is a much-needed antidote to the murky "politics of personal destruction. "When politicians (again, both liberal and conservative) feel disabled from objecting to candidates on ideological grounds, they search high and low for pretexts on which to object: "He made this lewd statement to a colleague a decade ago," or "She committed this technical infraction of law."

Senators should not feel that they have to reveal or attack some personal blemish in order to justify a vote against a nominee. A deep, urgent, political disagreement is sufficient. It should be possible for a senator to acknowledge that a nominee is honorable, competent, and kind while still voting against confirmation because of the way the candidate would likely act as a judge. Nothing personal. Just politics.

Alexander Wohl

As Capitol Hill adjusts to Vermont Senator Jim Jeffords's earthshaking repudiation of the Republican Party, the Senate Judiciary Committee is bracing itself to be the center of the aftershocks. The judicial branch of government, after all, is where a president is likely to have his most far-reaching impact; the judges he appoints will last much longer than the one or two terms he serves. And the Judiciary Committee--which is a key venue for debate about potent legislative issues such as abortion, school prayer, flag burning, and civil rights--is also the primary battleground in judicial-confirmation fights. Thus, with George W. Bush's first slate of nominees for the federal bench waiting for hearings, the most resounding political clashes of the summer are likely to occur on the Judiciary Committee's turf.

When Jeffords abandoned the Republicans, he threw control of Senate committees to the Democratic Party, providing Dems on the Judiciary Committee with the power to strangulate nominations in committee. (Actually, as of this writing, Republicans--aware of how defiantly they refused to allow many of Bill Clinton's nominations to get beyond the Judiciary Committee, and afraid of payback--are trying to force the Democrats to permit a full Senate vote for every judiciary nominee. A politically foolish position that will likely come to a quick resolution, this could bring all Senate business to a halt.) Given a free hand to nominate and confirm judges, Bush and the Senate Republicans would no doubt populate the federal bench with an army of Antonin Scalia clones--a legion of judges who, though perhaps ethnically diverse, share the extreme views of the Court's most conservative jurist. Indeed, the first batch of nominees the president sent to the Senate for confirmation has already made this clear. One logical response to such nominees would seem to be simply to block their consideration--especially since that was the Republican response to Clinton nominees whom the GOP considered to be too liberal.

But early signs indicate that the newly Democrat-controlled Judiciary Committee, along with the Senate as a whole, is taking a less direct and more wide-ranging approach, one that makes use of several different strategies at once while trying to minimize the danger of a public backlash. This highlights an important question , Is it worth letting all but the most conservative judges onto the federal bench--where they will preside for lifetime appointments, potentially lending important appeals courts a conservative coloration for up to 30 or 40 years--in order not to appear "obstructionist"? For some Democrats concerned with winning re-election, the answer may be yes. Still, if they're smart and stick together, the Democrats on the Judiciary Committee may be able to ensure that only the more moderate of Bush's nominees come to a full Senate vote--and to demonstrate the wisdom of their case to the American public.

"Don't Mess with Vermont"

How successful the Democrats are in preventing the confirmation of conservative judges will depend heavily on the committee's new chairman. A soft-spoken, liberal Vermonter, Patrick Leahy is a 27-year Senate veteran who has distinguished himself from many of his colleagues with his integrity and lack of ego. Smart and unafraid to play political hardball when necessary, he is adept at diffusing tension with gentle humor. (The day after the Jeffords switch, for example, "Don't Mess with Vermont" bumper stickers--attributed to Leahy--appeared around Washington, D.C.)

Leahy replaces Utah Senator Orrin Hatch--a fierce conservative whose favorite topic in recent committee sessions has been his own evenhandedness--as the ranking majority member on the committee. (Transcripts of recent hearings reveal Hatch to be remarkably, repetitively taken with his own "fairness.") Though Hatch has worked with Democrats on occasion, he fights hard for conservative Republican nominees and has the battle scars from the Robert Bork and Clarence Thomas Supreme Court nominations to prove it.

Leahy and Hatch consider themselves close friends and generally work well together. During Hatch's quixotic presidential run through early 2000, Leahy offered "to speak for him or against him, whichever would help more." But beneath this geniality, both sides are girding for war. Within days of Jeffords's announcement, Hatch was warning Democrats that "nobody's going to push me around." Leahy, for his part, has shown himself unafraid to take on the Republicans: He has challenged the GOP's hypocritical statements about the "quick pace" of Clinton nominations during Republican control of the committee and engineered a walkout from a hearing in which he felt the Republicans were trying to strong-arm Democrats into approving Bush nominees.

But for the first time in seven years, the Democrats have the numbers--if not literally (at this writing, the Senate leadership is negotiating whether the party balance on the committee will remain evenly split or a Democrat will be added to give the Dems a one-person advantage), then at least in terms of power. Majority status gives Leahy the gavel--and with it, the power to schedule and time hearings. Democrats now control the process: They decide when (and even if) nominees are brought up, how zealously they are interrogated, and how quickly they get voted on. And Senate Democratic aides say that Leahy is ready to take a much tougher line than others have in the past.

The recent debate over Ted Olson's nomination as solicitor general suggests how potent the Democrats' new majority status on the committee can be, if only they can muster the courage to exercise it. Erstwhile Senate Majority Leader Trent Lott was forced to discharge Olson's nomination from the Judiciary Committee (he did this under the bargain struck relating to the 50–50 Senate divide) the day Jeffords announced his switch: Lott knew that if he waited, the Democrats could use their new power in the Judiciary Committee to withhold the nomination from the floor. Moreover, after seeing Olson get voted in by the Senate--albeit by a razor-thin majority--Democrats surely understand that stopping someone is easier in committee than on the Senate floor, where there is the danger that some conservative Democrats will join the Republicans in crucial votes, as Georgia's Zell Miller and Nebraska's Ben Nelson did on Olson.

But now that the Democrats possess the power in the Judiciary Committee, will they be willing to use it? After failing to block Attorney General John Ashcroft and Solicitor General Olson, some Democrats said, in effect, "Well, we got enough votes to demonstrate that we could block a nomination--but we didn't do it because these were only cabinet appointments, not Supreme Court justices, which are lifetime appointments." Fair enough. But lower-court federal judges get appointed for life, too. Do the Democrats have the will to scrutinize and oppose district and circuit court candidates?

Whom to Oppose?

Democrats are still strategizing about whom they should oppose. This requires a calculated analysis not just of the nominees' records and the courts for which the judges have been nominated, but of public opinion. Democrats have seen how the perception of obstructionism or intransigence has sometimes hurt the Republicans--most notably after the government shutdown in 1995, during Clinton's impeachment in 1998, and last month when the GOP lost Jeffords--and don't want to be perceived that way themselves.

Both Leahy and the new majority leader, South Dakota's Tom Daschle, have said that they will work to prevent an ideological court packing and that they want "good, moderate, middle-of- the-road, credible" nominees. But already a number of Bush's nominees fall outside that description. This is particularly significant right now, because--after years of Republicans stonewalling Bill

Clinton's nominees--there are many vacancies, including 31 openings on federal appeals courts. Several circuit courts of appeal are very closely divided between liberals and conservatives. (The tiny First Circuit, for example, whose six judges cover Maine, Massachusetts, New Hampshire, Rhode Island, and Puerto Rico, has one opening and leans barely Republican; and the Third Circuit, which includes Delaware, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, and the Virgin Islands, is evenly divided and has two vacancies.) Just a few Bush appointees could tilt the judicial balance of the country in a decidedly conservative direction for a long time to come.

So Democrats considering circuit court nominees need to examine not just whether the prospective lifetime appointee has views so extreme as to be out of the mainstream, but whether adding that person to a court will change the ideological complexion of a particular circuit.

Given these parameters, there are several clear targets among the first group of Bush nominees. For instance, two Fourth Circuit nominees cry out for opposition. Terrence Boyle, chief judge of the U.S. District Court of the Eastern District of North Carolina, is a former aide to Senator Jesse Helms and, not surprisingly, is extremely conservative. He was already denied a spot on the court of appeals in 1991, when he was nominated by President George H.W. Bush, but the Senate did not act on his nomination. Helms retaliated by blocking all of President Clinton's nominees to fill North Carolina's Fourth Circuit vacancies. (Helms's desire to get Boyle on the court is ironic given Helms's repeated statements over the past several years that "there is no need to put more judges on that court because to do so would make it less efficient.")

The other nominee to the Fourth Circuit, South Carolina District Judge Dennis Shedd, is equally conservative; he served as chief counsel and staff director under former Judiciary Committee Chairman Strom Thurmond, who is now a senior committee member. Although Shedd has already attracted much opposition from civil rights groups, it will require coordinated strength to block him, given the tradition of deference to nominees who once worked in the Senate, even if only in a staff capacity.

But the Fourth Circuit already tilts heavily to the right. In contrast, the Sixth Circuit (which covers Michigan, Ohio, Tennessee, and Kentucky) and the D.C. Circuit are closely divided. Thus, Miguel Estrada, nominated for the D.C. Circuit, and Jeffrey Sutton, nominated for the Sixth, are judicial conservatives whom Democrats could confidently and appropriately oppose.

After the Supreme Court, the D.C Circuit is generally seen as the most powerful court in the nation, because of its role in interpreting statutes and agency decisions and because it has historically served as a springboard for potential Supreme Court nominees. Adding Estrada--who was a law partner of Ted Olson and is known for sharing the judicial philosophy of Justices Scalia and Thomas--to that court, along with another Bush nominee, the conservative John Roberts, would significantly enhance a slight conservative majority on this key bench.

The Sixth Circuit is even more closely divided. A former state solicitor from Ohio, Sutton--who has argued a number of times in the Supreme Court for expanded state power and for voiding congressional initiatives--has already been the focus of opposition. But another Sixth Circuit nominee, Ohio Supreme Court Justice Deborah Cook, also deserves a close look. In one representative decision, she denied a blind woman's request to be admitted to medical school because of the undue burden it would have placed on the school.

The 10th Circuit (which covers Colorado, Kansas, New Mexico, Oklahoma, Utah, & Wyoming) also is narrowly divided. The nomination to this court of Michael McConnell, a Federalist Society conservative and a professor at the University of Utah, has already generated opposition because of his extremist interpretation of the religion clauses of the First Amendment and their potential application to a variety of social issues ranging from school vouchers to gay rights.

Democrats can prevent Bush's nominees from being confirmed in several ways. First, of course, is to vote them down, either in committee or on the floor. Second is to delay their confirmation hearings indefinitely, as the Republicans did for so many Clinton nominees. (A variation on this option is to use control of the process to lengthen investigative hearings when that would be effective.) Expect Leahy to make use of both tactics. But more important is a third approach, which is to avoid nasty committee fights and use the potential power of a unified Democratic majority--for now, the committee will follow the caucus party line and vote up or down together--to influence the White House not to nominate right-wingers in the first place. It is therefore incumbent on the Bush White House, which until now has given only lip service to the idea of consultation with the Senate, to work with Leahy and the Democrats if it wants its nominees to be confirmed in a timely fashion.

Finally, several changes in procedure will slow down the process while adding an opportunity for more information and fairness. Leahy has already promised to reinstate the use of evaluations by the American Bar Association before any hearings. (This nonpartisan analysis of candidates, which every president since Dwight D. Eisenhower has used in considering nominees, was eliminated by George W. Bush.) Leahy is also likely to hold quick hearings for less controversial nominees and for nominees who are designated for courts with the greatest need before turning to the possible challenges. In this way, he can accumulate public support that he can later use in opposing the more conservative or controversial nominees. And he will probably not hold hearings for more than one nominee at a time--something that makes abundant sense but that the Republicans failed to do.

The prevailing view has been that nominees are presumed to be confirmable, unless senators or interest groups find something "wrong" with them. Some legal scholars have proposed the idea of requiring nominees to demonstrate why they should be confirmed, and there are signs that Leahy is open to this approach.

The Senate has an important role to play in evaluating and challenging individuals who are being appointed to a lifetime job of interpreting the Constitution. While Republicans are likely to cry "Bork!" whenever a nominee is criticized (even though the same Democratically controlled Congress that rejected Bork overwhelmingly confirmed Scalia), Democrats should not shy away from opposing any (and even many) of President Bush's nominees. Nor should they be tempted to give free passes to minority candidates if those candidates are too conservative. The Constitution says that the Senate will give its advice and consent on all nominations. Most Americans don't want a judiciary slanted sharply in either direction. We will soon see whether the new majority in the Senate has the guts and the ability to make a credible case to the American people that President Bush should not have the unilateral authority to shape the judicial branch in his conservative image.

At High Court, a Retirement Watch

Rehnquist, O'Connor Top List of Possibilities as Speculation on Replacement Grows
Charles Lane and Amy Goldstein

As the Supreme Court prepares to end its term this month, the White House, the Senate and interest groups across the ideological spectrum are preparing for the possibility that a member of the court might retire, with Chief Justice William H. Rehnquist's departure the most frequently mentioned scenario.

There is no direct evidence that Rehnquist, 76, or any other member of the court is planning to step down this year. Justice Sandra Day O'Connor, 71, recently dampened speculation about her departure, making an unusual announcement that she had "no plans" to leave. When Rehnquist was asked through the Supreme Court press office for a similar statement, he declined to comment.

Now that a Republican occupies the White House for the first time in eight years, however, court observers consider it more likely that Rehnquist or O'Connor, who were both longtime activists in Arizona Republican politics before being appointed to the court by Republican presidents, will step down sometime in the next few years.

"Make no mistake," said one longtime friend of the chief justice, Rehnquist would prefer to "return" his seat to a Republican president. But another justice recently told a friend there was no suggestion around the court that a departure is imminent.

Similarly, a lawyer who has regular contact with the White House counsel's office said, "I don't see the kind of frenzied activity by people who would be involved" in the administration if they knew a retirement were looming. In the past, many justices have directly or indirectly relayed their departure plans to the White House slightly before announcing them publicly, often at the end of the term.

Nonetheless, the thought of stepping down apparently has at least crossed Rehnquist's mind. When PBS interviewer Charlie Rose asked in February if he could imagine retiring, Rehnquist replied, "Sure."
Justice John Paul Stevens, 81, is older than Rehnquist and O'Connor, and he also was appointed by a Republican president, Gerald R. Ford, in 1975. But Stevens is not considered a likely candidate for retirement. He remains in vigorous health -- and, though still nominally a

Republican, has moved to the left in his years on the court. He dissented vigorously from last year's court decision, spearheaded by its most conservative members, to stop the Florida recount and effectively ensure Bush's victory.

There have been no changes in membership at the Supreme Court since Stephen G. Breyer replaced Harry Blackmun in the fall of 1994, creating the second-longest period of stability in the court's history and pent-up anxiety about when the next vacancy will occur.

In such an uncertain climate, the administration, Congress and advocacy groups are keenly sensitive to the opportunity President Bush will have to shape the court -- one of the presidency's most enduring powers. The White House and the Justice Department have been working for months to define the factors that would go into choosing a nominee, as well as beginning to sift through potential candidates.

"We are working hard to be prepared," said White House Counsel Alberto R. Gonzales, who oversees the selection process and is himself a potential choice. "Even during the transition we began thinking about possible nominees to the court."

On Capitol Hill, Republicans on the Senate Judiciary Committee have already begun "informal discussions and talks" about potential candidates, said Makan Delrahim, the committee's GOP staff director.

In the meantime, conservative and liberal advocacy groups have been working aggressively to try to influence the president's eventual choice -- and public opinion. Conservatives have been urging Bush not to back down from his campaign statements that the current justices he most admires are Antonin Scalia and Clarence Thomas, the members furthest to the right.

"We are looking to him to stay as close to that standard and as consistently close to that standard as he can," said Thomas L. Jipping, director of the judicial selection monitoring project of the Free Congress Foundation.

On the left, civil rights groups and women's organizations have been trying to stoke public fears that Bush's impact on the court could have dire consequences on issues ranging from abortion to education to affirmative action.

"If George W. Bush follows through on his promise to the right wing and nominates someone in the mode of Scalia and Thomas and Rehnquist, then there is going to be an epic battle," said Ralph Neas, president of People for the American Way.

The ideological skirmish that has broken out in Congress during the last month over Bush's initial nominees to lower federal courts is widely considered a prelude to the full-scale battle that a Supreme Court opening could create.

According to aides in the administration and on Capitol Hill, the cross pressures on the president in making his selection will be intense. On the one hand, the shift of the Senate this month to

Democratic control, analysts say, could hinder Bush's prospects for securing a replacement as conservative as Rehnquist. At the same time, the GOP's right wing is insistent that the president must not reduce conservative strength on the court by nominating anyone more liberal than Rehnquist.

"The difficulty is that the president has got to decide, 'How much political capital am I willing to bleed for a controversial Supreme Court nominee?' " said a conservative legal expert.

In such a contentious environment, names that have been considered among Judiciary Committee Republicans, sources said, include federal appeals court judges Emilio Garza, Edith H. Jones and J. Michael Luttig and the committee's ranking Republican, Sen. Orrin G. Hatch (Utah).

Other possibilities the president might favor, a variety of sources say, include conservative appeals court judges J. Harvie Wilkinson and Frank H. Easterbrook and Washington lawyers John G. Roberts and Miguel Estrada, both nominated by Bush last month to the federal appeals court here.

Bush also could look to members of Congress, such as Sen. Jon Kyl (R-Ariz.) or Rep. Christopher Cox (R-Calif.), who was being considered by the White House this spring for an appeals court seat but withdrew from consideration because of opposition from California's Democratic senators.

Administration officials declined to confirm any candidates they are contemplating. Bush has indicated he would like to nominate the first Hispanic justice, a move that might help him woo Latino voters in 2004 and improve his chances of winning confirmation in the Senate. In that context, Gonzales, a former justice on the Texas Supreme Court and a confidant of Bush's, is considered a prime candidate.

Asked whether he might accept a nomination, Gonzales said: "I am asked this question a lot. I typically say I don't intend to be a candidate. . . . My focus is working here, serving this president in this capacity."

Some conservatives consider Gonzales too moderate, and others view him as lacking the experience to become chief justice. To allay such concerns, Bush could make a double switch, nominating a current member of the court -- perhaps O'Connor --to replace the chief justice and naming Gonzales an associate justice.

"Politically, nothing beats that pair," said a lawyer who knows several of the justices personally.

Rehnquist's departure would not be as politically momentous as that of O'Connor, who is a swing vote on the closely divided court. Rehnquist is a consistent conservative, so the prospect of an equally conservative Bush-nominated successor for him would merely reinforce the existing ideological mix.

"If O'Connor is stepping down, then there will be all these arguments . . . about the balance of the court," said Terry Eastland, publisher of the conservative Weekly Standard and a senior Justice Department official in the Reagan administration. "With Rehnquist, the Democrats might be more willing to defer to the president in terms of judicial philosophy."

By regaining control of the Senate, the Democrats now run the Judiciary Committee, which will largely determine how quickly a nomination is processed -- and how much the nominee is grilled about his or her judicial philosophy.

Some Senate Democrats have begun discussing whether they would even employ a filibuster or other procedural tactics to block a Bush appointee from being voted on by the full Senate -- a sharp departure from past practice. In 1987, Robert H. Bork was allowed a vote on the Senate floor, even after the Democratic-controlled Judiciary Committee rejected him. Bork lost the floor vote, 58 to 42.

Rehnquist has been on the court since 1972, when he became an associate justice under President Richard M. Nixon. President Ronald Reagan elevated Rehnquist to chief justice in 1986, to replace the retiring Warren E. Burger.

In a recent interview with Fox News, Rehnquist said he had thought of departing before he was tapped to be chief justice. He acknowledged he has been having trouble lately remembering names and sent this wistful message to his television audience: "I'll tell them this, that I just think I've been extraordinarily fortunate in my life, and I'm very grateful for my good fortune."

Rehnquist's health, particularly severe back pain, has been a problem in the past. Although he still must rise from the bench and stretch his back during the court's two-hour oral argument sessions, he now appears to be in good physical and mental condition.

Under Rehnquist, a five-member conservative majority on the court has moved the law in a decidedly conservative direction, trimming affirmative action, clearing legal obstacles to the application of capital punishment, and limiting federal authority over the states.

Asked during the PBS interview if it would make a difference to him that there is a Republican in the White House, Rehnquist did not answer directly but did concede that there had "traditionally" been a "slight preference" by justices to retire during administrations of the party that appointed them.

Daschle's 'Intensive Care Unit' to Attend to Patients' Rights

John Lancaster and Helen Dewar

POWER PLAY: The Senate has once again gone into overtime in trying to nail down the fine points of its shifting power balance, delaying approval of a new resolution on committee organization because of an unresolved dispute over the handling of judicial nominations.

Without an agreement, freshman senators are left without committee assignments, many Democratic committee chairmen have to operate with Republican majorities -- and President Bush will have to wait awhile longer for action on his nominees.

The reason is that the power-sharing agreement negotiated when the Senate was evenly divided lapsed when Democrats took control this month, meaning that committee organization reverts to what it was at the end of the 106th Congress -- until a new agreement is reached.

After two weeks of quiet, behind-the-scenes negotiations, Republicans went public last week with demands for a guarantee that Supreme Court nominees will come to the Senate floor for a vote and for public disclosure when nominees are blocked by their home-state senators under the "blue slip" process. They said they asked Majority Leader Daschle to put the two proposals to a vote by the Senate, and he refused.

Later, Daschle issued a statement saying he has made both public and private commitments to "assuring a fair process for judicial nominees" and wants to resolve remaining organizational issues "through negotiations and discussions, rather than with potentially divisive votes."

On a party-line vote, which is customary on votes related to party powers, the GOP proposals would be defeated 51-49. But Republicans could claim a moral high ground in favor of full disclosure and fair treatment for a new president's nominees.

Senate Majority Leader Tom Daschle on Judicial Nominations
Tony Snow, Juan Williams

WILLIAMS: Senator Daschle, since Mr. Jeffords has come over, at least for caucus purposes, with the Democrats, there's been no reorganization of the Senate. So I'm wondering, how are you operating? And what pressures are there on you, as the Senate majority leader, to in fact now reach some deal with the Republicans so that you can get back to business?

DASCHLE: Well, Juan, I've told my Republican colleagues that I'm not going to jam them, I'm going to give them time to sort this out. These transitions are never easy. It took Senator Lott and I a couple of months to work out power-sharing.

But this is nothing compared to what we had to work through with power-sharing. That was unprecedented. The circumstances now are certainly not unprecedented, and we went through a lot of the same types of questions in the 1950s. Ao this is really a matter of whether we have the one-vote majority in committees, whether or not we revert back to power-sharing if something would change, whether or not we can work (Publication page references are not available for this document.) out staff and budgets. I think we can, and I think we're getting closer.

WILLIAMS: Well, now, what about the pressure coming from the GOP to say, listen, we want some assurances, we want them written down, and, in specific, concern about judicial nominations and the fact that they not get bottled up in committee but be able to reach to the Senate floor for a full vote?

DASCHLE: Well, I have said over and over that we're going to be fair. We are determined not to engage in any payback. We're not going to do what we think in many cases was done to our nominees in the last eight years. That isn't what we're all about.

What we want to do is move forward, assure that there are votes. But we don't want to abrogate the constitutional process of advice and consent, to make sure, absolutely certain that the judiciary committee has the prerogative and has the responsibility that it's been charged to take on. And that's what this is about.

SNOW: But, Senator, the constitutional obligation is for the entire Senate, it's not the Senate Judiciary Committee. And the founders never said, well, we want the Judicial Committee to decide who gets to serve as judges.

What have you told Republicans, other than that you'd be fair? Specifically, what have you promised them?

DASCHLE: Well, what I've promised them, Tony, is that we were going to assure them that every nominee, regardless of whether it's judiciary or executive, will have a fair hearing, will have an opportunity to be considered, and I can't go any further than that.

Obviously, we don't want to see happen what happened over the last five years, where some judges were kept without even the opportunity to be heard for over four years; where some senators, because you had secret holds, were given no opportunity to have the right to be considered and to be voted on. We're not going to do that. I don't think we should do that.

But I'm not going to engage or commit to an extralegal process that says, in some cases, regardless of what the Judiciary Committee does, we're going to bypass the committee and go straight to the floor.

SNOW: Why not? That's the agreement you just had.

REV_00127671

DASCHLE: No, no, I don't think we've ever had an agreement of that kind.

SNOW: Did you not have an agreement that, when you had the 50-50 power-sharing agreement, that nominations would go to the Senate floor?

DASCHLE: No, what we had was an agreement that either the majority or the minority leader could make a motion to proceed to a nomination. And I obviously would be willing to look at something like that. But never did we have an automatic commitment that any nominee or any bill would come straight to the floor.

Senator Joe Biden on Judicial Nominations

Tim Russert

MR. RUSSERT: You're also a member of the Senate Judiciary Committee.

SEN. BIDEN: I am.

MR. RUSSERT: Harry Reid, Democratic senator from Nevada and a colleague of yours, said the other day, talking about the Supreme Court: "We may wind up with another Scalia. Even though I disagree with the result of some of his opinions, his ability to reason is about as good as I've ever seen. I'm not looking for another Antonin Scalia, but I think that he brings with him such an intriguing background and such a brilliant ability to reason, that if we had someone like him, it would be a tougher decision for the Senate."

SEN. BIDEN: Wouldn't be tough for me at all. I've spoken to Justice Scalia. I consider us good acquaintances. So we kid each other occasionally when he--like, for example, I got a note or a call, I can't recall which, saying when the special prosecutor thing was--when we all voted against it, you know, reinstating, he called and says, "See, I was right the first time in the Morrison vs. Olson case."

I teach constitutional law--he called me and said, "I better come up and help you with those students. They're getting the wrong idea." As I've said to him, bluntly, I regret--the two most regrettable decisions I made were voting for him and voting for Reagan's tax cut.

MR. RUSSERT: Scalia was confirmed 98-to-nothing.

SEN. BIDEN: No--he was, but you--remember the context then? The context was we had a governor named Mario Cuomo saying he'd kick anybody's rear-end who didn't vote for the Italian. And, you know, remember he didn't answer any questions and no one forced him to answer any questions. Look, the fact that someone is brilliant does not qualify them to be on the Supreme Court. They can be brilliant and wrong. I would like--for example, I think it's important there is a Scalia on the court. I'd like another Brennan on the court, as well. But if you want someone who's brilliant in his reasoning, equally as consequential, I'd take Souter. He's equally as bright as Scalia. Writes better than...

MR. RUSSERT: As chief justice.

SEN. BIDEN: As chief justice.

MR. RUSSERT: You don't believe the Democrats would ever support Scalia to be chief justice of the Supreme Court?

SEN. BIDEN: I'm not speaking to the Democrats. I'm speaking for me. His view of the Constitution, that there are no unenumerated rights in the Constitution, that there's a very--this is the most activist Supreme Court we've had in the history of the United States of America, Tim. They have--they're the only court that has ever declared unconstitutional seven national pieces of legislation. People don't know. They declared, for example, the Older Americans Act unconstitutional as it applies to states.

MR. RUSSERT: But doesn't George Bush have a right to have conservatives on the Supreme Court?

SEN. BIDEN: Sure, he does. And I have a right to have who I want. This is what they call, you know, co-equal branches of government.

MR. RUSSERT: A liberal litmus test?

SEN. BIDEN: No, no. No, no, no. You're putting words in my mouth. You said, "Does he have a right to have conservatives?" To the degree that he pushes to the right, I can push to the center or to the left. The Constitution says that the United States Senate gets to determine--he gets to pick, his is to propose, ours is to dispose. We have from Rutledge back in the turn of the century with George Washington straight on through. We've rejected people whose views we believe are out of sync with what the Senate is.

I was asked advice by President Clinton when he had a chance to put people on the court. I went down to see him. I said, "Mr. President, when there's a divided government, you should pick someone in the middle. You should understand that." And he did. My advice to the president of the United States is if he wants a holy war, he can do that and pick another Scalia. But there's a divided government. The nation is divided on these issues. He should pick someone who is a centrist. He can be center right, but to pick someone on the extreme left or right would be a serious mistake, in my opinion.

Two Superior Judges Merit Confirmation

Jim Petro, Ohio State Auditor (Editorial)

During the 2000 presidential campaign, President Bush promised that he would nominate for federal judgeships only people of the highest integrity and professional competence and who possess the proper judicial temperament. Recently, Bush began delivering on that promise by nominating 11 men and women from across the country from both political parties for seats on the various federal courts of appeal.

Ohioans should be proud that for the first two of seven vacancies on the 6th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals, which covers Ohio, Michigan, Kentucky and Tennessee, the president nominated two outstanding Ohioans to serve on that bench: Ohio Supreme Court Justice Deborah L. Cook and former state solicitor Jeffrey S. Sutton.

As former assistant prosecutor, city law director in Rocky River and lawyer in private practice for the past 28 years, it has been my pleasure and privilege to have appeared before and practiced with thousands of judges and attorneys throughout the state. Without a doubt, Cook and Sutton are among the best-qualified lawyers to serve in the federal judiciary that I have seen in my legal career.

After a distinguished 13-year career in private practice in Akron, Cook joined the Ohio Court of Appeals in 1991, where she quickly developed an excellent reputation for her hard work and for the quality of her opinions. Elected and re-elected to the Ohio Supreme Court in 1994 and 2000, Cook has been praised by The Dispatch for her "keen intellect" and "careful legal scholarship."

The newspaper noted that she applies the law "without fear or favor" in crafting rulings that are governed by the Constitution and not by popularity polls or special interests.

Sutton graduated first in his class at Ohio State University Law School and served as a law clerk for two different U.S. Supreme Court justices, a rare honor. As Ohio's state solicitor, he was responsible for arguing cases of the utmost importance to Ohioans before both the Ohio and the U.S. Supreme Courts.

A prolific legal scholar, Sutton has written more than 50 law review articles and two legal texts. While keeping his private practice in Columbus, he also is teaching constitutional law at OSU law school.

When Bush submitted his nominees for the federal appeals courts to the U.S. Senate for confirmation, he called upon senators of both parties to restore civility and dignity to the confirmation process, and, most importantly, he asked for a prompt vote on each nominee.

Right now the court, based in Cincinnati, is critically short of judges to handle an ever-expanding caseload. Because of their impeccable credentials, Cook and Sutton should be swiftly confirmed.

Lack of News Makes Pontificating Difficult but Not Impossible

Joe Hallett, Dispatch Politics Editor

A big patch of white space, a fast-closing deadline and an empty head. Mid- June and the dog days are here already. Will loyal readers -- both of them -- notice if there is no column this week? Can't do commentary without some news. It's plain dead around here.

Speaking of death, maybe column grist could be ground from the pending U.S. Supreme Court case on whether mentally ill murderers should be executed. But what's the point now? We already killed schizophrenic Jay D. Scott.

The legal system, though, is always column fodder, and it would be timely to discuss President Bush's nomination of Columbus attorney Jeffrey Sutton to the 6th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals in Cincinnati.

But that has to do more with the political system, and editors are always griping that readers don't care about politics. Why waste a column on it? So what if the new Democratic majority in the U.S. Senate, for its own partisan aggrandizement, stands ready to ravage Sutton's reputation?

So what if the Democrats are salivating to tar Sutton unfairly as an uncompassionate conservative for having the audacity to argue successfully before the U.S. Supreme Court that the Constitution limits the ability of citizens to sue state governments for discrimination against the disabled?

Does anyone think for a moment that Senate Democrats will care that Sutton, at age 40, suffers from osteoarthritis, a degenerative disease that eventually would have put him in a wheelchair, if not for the miracle of hip- replacement surgery?

Will Senate Democrats give a hoot that Sutton, a brilliant attorney by virtually everyone's account, has a history of performing free legal work for social causes and groups? He has argued, pro bono, on behalf of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People, the Anti-Defamation League of B'nai B'rith, the Center for the Prevention of Handgun Violence and the American Civil Liberties Union.

Not long ago, Sutton took up the cause of a Chillicothe prison inmate and won a 9-0 decision from the U.S. Supreme Court, the ninth case in five years he had argued before the high court, probably more than any other private attorney.

Senate Democrats won't care. They're bent on getting back at Republicans for confirming only 61 percent of President Clinton's judicial nominees. When and if the Democrats give Sutton a hearing, they'll be more concerned about placating the constituencies who larder their coffers than putting a fair, honest person on the federal bench.

In a hearing process that too often has turned well-meaning nominees from both parties into bitter and spiteful judges -- Supreme Court Justice Clarence Thomas comes to mind --Sutton will be put through the political wringer, used and abused, to signal Bush that his Supreme Court nominees can expect even tougher treatment.

But, heck, nobody is interested in such political shenanigans except for maybe both readers of this column.

Well, then, there is the school-funding case. The Ohio Supreme Court will hear arguments Wednesday. For a third time, the court is expected to rule 4-3 that the legislature and governor failed to ensure an adequate and equitable education for Ohio's schoolchildren.

Lawyers for the state hope to turn one of two Republican justices, Paul E. Pfeifer or Andrew Douglas, who formed the majority with two Democrats in the previous decisions. A victory for the financially insatiable coalition of schools almost certainly will mean higher taxes.

The school-funding case has been around for 10 years. Yesterday's news is boring.

Oh, yeah, there's the Big Three Republican feud at the Statehouse. But that, too, is insider politics. Speaker Larry Householder of Glenford and Senate President Richard H. Finan of Cincinnati had their way with Gov. Bob Taft on the state budget and now they are poised to embarrass the governor by overriding some of his 49 vetoes.

Obviously, Taft's re-election in 2002 is not a high priority for Republicans controlling the General Assembly. For that matter, it appears not to be a high priority for Taft. While getting pushed around by legislative Republicans, he declined to use the bully pulpit to defend his own reasonable budget proposal, one that would not have gutted higher education.

Taft may have trouble telling voters what he stands for next year. But that's then and this is now, and there is nothing going on.

Unless, of course, anyone considers the latest scandal at the Ohio Department of Job and Family

REV_00127676

Services worthy of comment. News flash: Department illegally withholds more child-support payments from poor children. Routine stuff.

Maybe a column could be crafted around the big-money push at the Statehouse to permit video-gambling machines at Ohio's seven horse racetracks. But thanks to Taft, that's dead for the moment. Maybe something could be written about all the wacko legislation that right-wingers in the House want to pass. But why dignify wackiness?

My gosh, look at the time! All this white space to fill and nothing to write. Will somebody please make some news around here?

Heat Turned Up High in Judicial Kitchen

Russ Pulliam

He's been there, done that.

Federal Judge Daniel Manion recommends a thick skin and some experience in rough-and-tumble political battles for potentially controversial judicial nominees. President Bush already has submitted some nominations for federal court positions for U.S. Senate confirmation. But the big battle is yet to come with an anticipated opening on the U.S. Supreme Court in the next year or so.

When Manion was nominated by President Ronald Reagan for the 7th Circuit Court of Appeals in 1986, the mild-mannered former state senator from South Bend was surprised to become the center of controversy. The Manion battle was a warm-up for bigger ones over subsequent nominations of Robert Bork and Clarence Thomas for the Supreme Court.

Manion was blasted by People for the American Way and Senate Democrats for being unqualified for the court position. Sen. Edward Kennedy called him "the least-qualified" nominee he had ever seen for the federal appeals court. His critics found fault with his proof-reading because of errors in his correspondence.

Yet Manion also attracted endorsements from liberal Democrats who knew him back in Indiana. He made it to the bench after close votes in the Senate.

Manion understood that his critics weren't aiming the mud-slinging at him personally. What they really objected to was his willingness to look to the original intent of the Constitution. But he worries that mud-slinging campaigns that got worse under Bork and Thomas could deter qualified people from serving on the courts.

"I had a much thicker skin politically," he said in a recent interview. "I understood what was going on."

Good lawyers can make more money in private practice. "Why should I subject myself to this kind of attack?" he can hear potential candidates say. "I don't need to have my name dragged through the mud. Who knows what they'll come up with -- what kind of magazines you subscribe to. That's the kind of drivel it descends to," Manion added.

Critics might suggest that those who can't stand the heat should stay out of the judicial kitchen. But the judicial branch traditionally has been set above the partisan politics of the legislative and executive branches. Until the Bork-Thomas controversies, a long tradition was to evaluate court nominees on the basis of competence and personal character.

Manion has had the last word with the critics who attacked his alleged incompetence. "He made a liar out of them," commented a court colleague, William Bauer. "He is very bright, hard-working, thoughtful. Our job is to make sure we follow the Constitution. That's what he does very well."

Another Indiana lawyer, Peter Rusthoven, was associate counsel during the Reagan administration and gained an insider's perspective on the court nomination process. He suggests that more ideological battles over these nominations will undermine confidence in the courts as impartial decision-makers.

"Judicial nominations are no longer about, is this person smart, well-trained in the law, hard-working," he said. "Instead, you're nominating a person who is going to have one vote in a super-legislature, and that super-legislature is going to decide all kinds of things that the courts traditionally never decided."

With activist judges "writing" laws, the executive and legislative branches lose their chance to settle controversial political and social issues. Rusthoven is hoping for more strict constructionist judges who will be willing to defer issues back to the legislative branch when no clear constitutional issues are at stake.

He points to the 1857 Dred Scott decision as a notorious example of judicial activism, with the court taking over the slavery issue by ruling that blacks were not citizens. "It severely minimized the possibility of working out the slavery issue in the elected or political branches of government," he said. "It took away from the Congress the ability to regulate slavery in the territories."

The Senate ought to give Bush the green light to nominate strict-constructionist judges for the high court. A few more of them could help take the court out of some of the controversial political issues that are better left to the two elected branches of government.

Reason to Reject

Elizabeth Cavendish, Legal Director, NARAL

We take exception to the belief that it is unfair to challenge the qualifications of judicial nominee John G. Roberts Jr. based upon antiabortion briefs he filed as a government lawyer [editorial, June 7].

Mr. Roberts was a political appointee in the Reagan administration and served as principal deputy solicitor general for President Bush from 1989 to 1993. He competed for the job knowing that the administration had the goal of rescinding the constitutional right of reproductive choice.

During the Reagan and Bush era, the Justice Department argued to restrict or overturn the fundamental right to choose eight times in seven Supreme Court cases. Mr. Roberts helped author the brief in Rust v. Sullivan, defending the now-repealed "gag rule" that prohibits family planning providers from informing women of all their options when confronting an unwanted pregnancy. Saying the Roberts brief argued "in passing" for the overturn of Roe, as the editorial did, suggests it is inconsequential to urge that constitutional rights be repealed. Would The Post make the same argument about efforts to reverse Brown v. Board of Education?

In Bray v. Alexandria Women's Health Clinic, Mr. Roberts, on behalf of the Bush Justice Department, intervened as a friend of the court. The government's friendship was extended to Operation Rescue, which was terrorizing women who were trying to enter reproductive health facilities. Mr. Roberts argued that the nation's civil rights laws should be narrowly interpreted to preclude relief for women seeking constitutionally protected health services. Congress disagreed and the following year enacted the Freedom of Access to Clinic Entrances Act.

No one has an entitlement to a lifetime slot on the federal judiciary. The burden is on the nominee to demonstrate that he or she deserves Senate confirmation. This high threshold is essential to ensure that the judiciary will continue to guard our liberties against assault.

G.O.P. Reports an 'Impasse' Over Senate Reorganization
Alison Mitchell

Senior Senate Republicans said today that they had hit an impasse in talks with the new Democratic majority leader over organizing the Senate because of disputes about how to handle judicial nominees. They called for the issues in contention to be brought to the full Senate floor for a vote.

After two weeks of talks with Senator Tom Daschle of South Dakota, the new majority leader, the five Republican negotiators went public with their complaints this evening as the Senate was shutting down for the week.

"We are reluctantly here to announce we are at impasse at the moment," said Senator Mitch McConnell, Republican of Kentucky.

The Republican senators said they had reached agreement with the Democrats on essential details like the size and makeup of committees. But they said they wanted the resolution needed to organize the Senate under Democratic control to contain an assurance that all nominees for the Supreme Court would come before the full Senate for a vote.

They said they also wanted the resolution to require that if any senator exercised the right under Senate tradition to block a home-state judicial nominee, the action must be revealed to the public. Senator Phil Gramm, Republican of Texas, called such disclosure a "good government, sunshine provision."

The Republicans handed out a report showing that since at least the 1880's, the Judiciary Committee had sent to the floor even those Supreme Court nominations that were opposed by a committee majority.

Mr. Daschle said in a statement that he would continue to try to resolve the outstanding issues "through negotiations and discussions rather than potentially divisive votes. "He said he had "stated publicly and privately my commitment to assuring a fair process for judicial nominees."

But he has resisted setting down any formal procedure. One Democratic Senate aide said that a "subtle distinction but an important distinction" existed between a guarantee that the Judiciary Committee would send a Supreme Court nominee to the full Senate and an informal tradition of doing so. "It would be an unprecedented new grant of authority to the minority party," the aide said.

The issue of judicial candidates and the ideological direction of the federal courts is one of the most delicate areas of dispute between the parties. During the six years that the Republicans controlled the Senate and Bill Clinton was president, the Republicans offered neither of the guarantees to the Democrats that they are now seeking.

But they say they have been disturbed by vows by some Democrats to stop conservative judges. And they say they would be willing to make the two provisions they are seeking permanent no matter which party has control of the Senate.

Senator Patrick Leahy of Vermont, the new Judiciary chairman, issued a statement saying: "There is more than a little irony in the charge from some Republican quarters that the Democratic Senate will treat President Bush's judicial nominees unfairly. Some Republicans seem to be expecting in Democrats the same wiles that the G.O.P. Senate used in killing so many of President Clinton's nominees."

If the Senate held a vote on the two issues, the Republicans would probably not prevail. But the vote would put the Democrats in the politically embarrassing position of opposing public disclosure and looking like they were ready to block President Bush's Supreme Court picks.

When the Senate switched last week to Democratic control with Senator James M. Jeffords of Vermont becoming an independent, Mr. Daschle became majority leader and Democrats became committee chairmen. But many of the details of the changeover need to be approved by a vote.

Mr. Daschle hinted today that a long stalemate could be a problem for Mr. Bush. "What that means is action in the committees on virtually anything is unlikely," he said. "We wouldn't be able to do nominations or legislation because obviously you don't have the full complement of membership on those committees."

Bush's Judgeships Stall in the Senate

Dave Boyer

Senate Republican negotiators late yesterday declared an impasse in their talks with Democrats on President Bush´s judicial nominees and said it was time to move forward with an up-or-down vote on the new Senate organization.

"We are only asking for fairness," said Sen. Mitch McConnell, Kentucky Republican. The negotiators said the next move is up to Senate Majority Leader Tom Daschle, South Dakota Democrat, on whether to call a vote.

Republicans want the resolution to reflect the three points on which both parties agree, and the two contentious matters voted on independently as amendments to the resolution.

Republicans said the full Senate should have the opportunity to make a determination and that they would not filibuster if the resolution is voted down.

"We´re simply asking for there to be a vote. When we have fundamental differences, we vote," said Sen. Arlen Specter, Pennsylvania Republican. Both parties agree Democrats will have a one-seat majority on every committee, with the exception of the Ethics Committee, which by tradition is equally divided.

All committee members will retain their assignments, and committee funding and space agreements negotiated by the chairmen and ranking members will remain in effect. Democrats do not agree with Republicans that "blue slips," or single-senator veto slips on judges from home-state senators, should be eliminated.

Democratic leaders turned up the pressure yesterday on judgeships, accusing the GOP of holding up White House nominations by not submitting to the Democrats´ proposal to reorganize the Senate.

"They´re making my life easier," said Sen. Patrick J. Leahy, Vermont Democrat and chairman of the Senate Judiciary Committee. "For the life of me, I don´t know why they keep waiting. I´m ready to start (confirmation hearings) within 10 days to two weeks of the time that we reorganize."

Republicans say Mr. Leahy, one of the party's most liberal lawmakers, is a prime example of why they are pressing Mr. Daschle for assurances that Mr. Bush's nominees will be treated fairly. Mr. Leahy was one of the most outspoken critics of John Ashcroft's nomination for attorney general in a bruising confirmation hearing in January.

In two weeks of talks, Mr. Daschle has resisted Republican requests to promise floor votes on appeals court candidates and Supreme Court nominees if the Judiciary Committee rejects them. Mr. Daschle says he will hold up a deal to reorganize committees with Democratic majorities until both sides agree on the issue of nominations.

Democrats say Senate Republicans are only hurting their own administration by not accepting Democrats' more vague, nonbinding assurance to be fair to nominees. "Unfortunately, what that means is that action in the committees on virtually anything is unlikely," Mr. Daschle said yesterday.

"We wouldn't be able to do nominations or legislation. We're going to ... probably be faced with a bottled-up array of , but we won't be able to do that." Asked if he is "jamming" the White House's agenda, Mr. Daschle replied, "That's not my choice. I think it would be inexcusable for us to disenfranchise elected members of the Senate who were serving on these committees just a week ago, and now to tell them they can't vote. That isn't my jamming them, that is simply a reality; that's what senators are here to do, is to make decisions."

Referring to the new majority party's power to investigate the administration, Mr. Daschle added, "In the meantime, we'll be satisfied, I suppose, with the opportunities to hold oversight hearings and other kinds of hearings. ..." For example, Sen. Joseph I. Lieberman, Connecticut Democrat, has used his new chairmanship of the Governmental Affairs Committee to hold a hearing on the administration's refusal to set energy price caps in California. Mr. Lieberman, who lost his bid for the vice presidency last year and is considered a likely presidential candidate for 2004, also plans to hold hearings on Mr. Bush's environmental policies.

Reception President Bush's Federal Judge Nominees Face From The Democratic-Controlled Senate

Bob Edwards, Anchor; Nina Totenburg, Reporting

This is MORNING EDITION from NPR News. I'm Bob Edwards.

For six years, Democrats fumed when President Clinton's judicial nominees were stalled

by the Republican-controlled Senate. But the tables have been turned. Now there's a Republican president and a Democratic Senate. NPR legal affairs correspondent Nina Totenberg reports on what this could mean for President Bush's nominees.

NINA TOTENBERG reporting:

About 1/8th of the federal judiciary is vacant. But while 70 of the 102 vacancies are in the trial courts, President Bush has made just two nominations to fill those slots. Instead, the administration is concentrating on filling the 32 appeals court vacancies. The president has already sent the Senate names for half of those slots. There's a reason for that. The appeals courts are just one step below the Supreme Court, and these are the judges that are the final word in most of the cases heard across the country. Moreover, they are widely considered training grounds for the Supreme Court.

Indeed, it was the Clinton nominees for the appellate courts who were most ferociously stalled by the GOP in years gone by. The numbers tell the tale. Although Presidents Clinton and Reagan won confirmation for roughly equal numbers of judges in their two terms, Mr. Reagan won confirmation of 87 percent of his appeals court nominees, while Mr. Clinton won confirmation of only 61 percent, leaving the rest dangling without action.

In the last two years of the Clinton presidency, 17 appeals court nominees never got a hearing. Those who were confirmed waited, on average, more than a year. Contrast that with the wait for President Reagan's nominees in his last two years when the Democrats controlled the Senate, 17 weeks, and for the first President Bush's nominees, 15 weeks. The result is that now, after eight years of a Democratic administration, Republican appointees still dominate the influential appeals courts. President Bush wants to add to that advantage, and as Democrats see it, he has front-loaded the nomination process, concentrating his early judicial nominations in the appeals court. Senator Patrick Leahy, the Democratic chairman of the Senate Judiciary Committee, having served with six presidents, has this perspective.

Senator PATRICK LEAHY (Chairman, Senate Judiciary Committee): Presidents serve for no more than eight years; judges serve for a lifetime. And I think the Senate has a real responsibility to make sure that we have an independent judiciary, one that doesn't lurch to the right or the left.

TOTENBERG: And Leahy insists he will be fair.

Sen. LEAHY: I've talked with a number of Republican senators, and some have told me very frankly they were totally unfair to President Clinton and they're wondering if I'm going to do the same thing to them. I'm not. I'm not going to go for some kind of a payback.

TOTENBERG: Not surprisingly, the Republicans aren't taking those assurances at face value. A new group has sprung up, billing itself as bipartisan, and it's running ads, so far in just one state, South Dakota, which just happens to be the home of the Democratic Senate majority leader, Tom Daschle.

(Soundbite of advertisement)

Unidentified Woman: Our legal system affects us all. Every day courts make decisions that impact our families. That's why President Bush supports commonsense judges with character, experience and intellect.

TOTENBERG: Oklahoma Governor Frank Keating, a Republican, is chairman of the sponsoring group, Citizens for Common Sense Courts.

Governor FRANK KEATING (Republican, Oklahoma): The judiciary shouldn't be an arm of either party. Let's fairly get judges considered and confirmed.

TOTENBERG: But while Keating's group bills itself as bipartisan, the Democratic featured most prominently in its literature, former Democratic Attorney General Griffin Bell, says he is, in fact, not part of the group, that he declined to join, and yesterday the group retracted his name. That's not to say that Republican fears are unfounded. Liberal groups are already lining up to oppose a significant number of President Bush's judicial nominees. Nan Aron is director of the Alliance for Justice, an umbrella group of civil rights, environmental and consumer organizations.

Ms. NAN ARON (Alliance for Justice): We have grave doubts about most of the candidates nominated by President Bush. They were chosen by this president specifically because, while they may be very qualified and have excellent records on the law, they have shown by their actions or writings a real hostility to the gains made by women, minorities, and hostility to the role that government plays in improving the lives of Americans.

TOTENBERG: And specific groups have targeted specific nominees. Americans United for Separation of Church and State is opposing University of Utah Professor Michael McConnell, a respective conservative scholar who's long argued for greater accommodation between church and state. Also opposed to McConnell is the National Abortion Rights Action League, which cites his strong opposition to Roe vs. Wade. In addition, NARAL is also fighting the appeals court nomination of John Roberts, who, when he served as deputy solicitor general in the first Bush administration, wrote a brief that argued against federally funded clinics allowing doctors to discuss abortion with their patients. In that brief, Roberts contended that Roe vs. Wade should be reversed, a position he was quizzed about by Justice Harry Blackmun in a later case that he argued involving abortion clinics.

(Soundbite of interview)

Justice HARRY BLACKMUN: Mr. Roberts, in this case, are you asking that Roe vs. Wade by overruled?

Mr. JOHN ROBERTS: No, Your Honor. The issue doesn't even come up.

Justice BLACKMUN: Well, that hasn't prevented the solicitor general from taking that position

in prior cases.

TOTENBERG: But Walter Dellinger, who served as solicitor general in the Clinton administration, says it's very risky to judge judicial nominees by the positions they've taken as government lawyers.

Mr. WALTER DELLINGER (Former Solicitor General, Clinton Administration): The kind of arguments that John Roberts was making in the position of deputy solicitor general were the kind that a professional lawyer's expected to make when his client, the chief executive of which is the president of the United States, has run on those positions. I'm afraid that this is a process that will lead to the rejection of the most qualified of the nominees; that is, those who, like Roberts, have been out and have had a major lifetime of accomplishment.

TOTENBERG: Elizabeth Cavendish, the legal director of NARAL, disagrees.

Ms. ELIZABETH CAVENDISH (Legal Director, NARAL): He was aligned personally with these decisions. Again, he was a political appointee, and this was a signature position of the first Bush administration.

TOTENBERG: There's an irony in NARAL's position. Liberal groups were outraged when conservatives opposed some Clinton appointees because of positions they took as lawyers. I pressed the point on Cavendish. So you would say that those who are anti-abortion would be completely correct in voting their ideas and proposing pro-choice nominees.

Ms. CAVENDISH: It doesn't work both ways. The other side wants to turn back the clock on women's rights and roll back a fundamental right.

TOTENBERG: Just what will happen to the Roberts and McConnell nominations and others is unclear. When the Republicans controlled the Senate, those nominees had been slated for quick hearings. With the Democrats in control now, though, the first hearing is likely to be for Roger Gregory, an African-American from Virginia appointed by President Clinton to sit on an interim basis for a year on the 4th Circuit Court of Appeals. President Bush reappointed Gregory. Chairman Leahy says he intends to begin confirmation hearings in less than two weeks, but by tradition only one appeals court nominee is considered at a time, and historically there's an average of about one confirmation hearing a month.

With only three months left scheduled in this legislative session this year, that would mean three or four appeals court nominees possibly confirmed this year. Even that could be in doubt. North Carolina Republican Senator Jesse Helms blocked all of President Clinton's North Carolina nominees to the 4th Circuit, and nobody's quite sure what he will do about the Gregory nomination when it gets to the Senate floor, where he could put a so-called hold on it and send it into limbo.

Moreover, all confirmation hearings are on hold for the moment, because the Senate Democrats and Republicans have not agreed to a reorganizing plan in the aftermath of the Democratic takeover. The Republicans are seeking something that no Senate minority has ever had before: a guarantee that all the president's nominees will get a floor vote. Few observers believe the Republicans will get such an unprecedented guarantee, because the current stalemate is perfectly acceptable to the Democrats. If the Senate organization agreement is not forthcoming, it means simply that no nominations will move at all. Nina Totenberg, NPR News, Washington.

Republicans Seeking to Secure Votes on Judicial Nominees

Jesse J. Holland

Republicans backed down on Thursday from some of their demands for how the newly Democrat-controlled Senate should handle President Bush's nominees for the Supreme Court and federal judgeships.

Earlier in the week, GOP negotiators demanded guaranteed Senate votes on all Supreme Court and federal appellate court nominees, and elimination of the secret veto process for some judicial nominations.

After Democrats refused, Republicans sought to allow the full Senate - instead of negotiators - to decide whether the Supreme Court nominees should be guaranteed a vote. They also want the Senate to decide whether to make the senatorial veto process public instead of private, as it has been in the past.

Democrats say they will treat Bush's nominees fairly. Republicans fear Democrats will block Bush's judicial nominations.

"We're not asking for there to be a commitment," said Sen. Arlen Specter, R-Pa., one of the five GOP senators who have been negotiating with Majority Leader Thomas Daschle, D-S.D. "We're asking for there to be a vote."

Daschle, who is trying to reorganize the Senate to reflect the Democratic takeover, is opposed.

"I remain committed to trying to resolve the outstanding issues around the organization of the Senate through negotiations and discussions, rather than with potentially divisive votes," Daschle said.

Democratic aides said the idea of making public the secret vetoes likely would come up a meeting Tuesday of Democratic senators.

The maneuvering is the result of Vermont Sen. Jim Jeffords' decision to leave the GOP and become an independent, altering the 50-50 split in the Senate. Republicans had control by virtue of Vice President Dick Cheney's tie-breaking vote.

The two sides agreed that Democrats will gain a one-seat majority on each Senate committee, and the size of committees will be expanded to accommodate the one-seat Democratic edge. All Republicans will keep their committee assignments, and committee funding and space agreements negotiated at the beginning of the year will stay in effect as well.

Sen. Orrin Hatch of Utah, the top Republican on the Judiciary Committee, said that while filibustering the reorganization had not been discussed, GOP senators told negotiators to "go to the wall" over the judges provision.

Daschle said that if Republicans and Democrats are unable to agree on a reorganization, "action in the committees on virtually anything is unlikely."

The Case for Borking

Randall Kennedy

As the battle over the federal judiciary heats up, progressives must convince the general public of a basic proposition: The judiciary is an inescapably political branch of government whose agents, the judges, should be viewed in much the same way other politicians are.

To say that the courts are political may seem so obvious as to be banal. There is, however, a deep and widespread impulse to deny the political character of the courts. An important manifestation of this denial arises in the context of selecting, confirming, or rejecting candidates for the federal bench.

Many people bemoan, for example, what they term the "politicization" of the judiciary (as if there existed a golden age when judicial selection and judicial decision making were uncontaminated by politics). Liberals and conservatives, Democrats and Republicans have taken turns accusing each other of indulging in this unpardonable sin.

Progressives, however, should get off that unproductive rhetorical merry-go-round, accept the ineradicable presence of politics in the judicial arena, and strive to shape the judiciary in such a way that it will produce good, sound, progressive rulings. That will entail, among other things, lobbying on behalf of jurists who will advance the progressive agenda and against those who will be hostile to it.

Article II of the U.S. Constitution empowers the president exclusively to nominate federal judges, while it imposes a check on presidential authority by making the seating of a nominee dependent on the Senate's "Advice and Consent." Whereas the president is armed with veto power over legislation, the Senate, in effect, has veto power over judicial nominations.

Over the course of the nation's history, the Senate has exercised that power over Supreme Court nominees 29 times (and over district and appeals court nominees many times more). In addition to objecting to nominees on grounds of incompetence, dishonesty, or some other personal failing, senators have also voted nay for political or ideological reasons.

Opponents blocked George Washington's Supreme Court nominee Judge John Rutledge because of Rutledge's opposition to the Jay Treaty (despite the fact that the Senate had already confirmed him for a previous opening on the Court and that he had just served for an entire Supreme Court term as the interim chief justice).

Ulysses S. Grant's nominee Attorney General Ebeneezer Rockwood Hoar was not confirmed because he had opposed President Andrew Johnson's impeachment.

Herbert Hoover's nominee Judge John Parker was blocked because of Parker's perceived hostility to organized labor and the advancement of African Americans. And Ronald Reagan's nominee Judge Robert Bork didn't make it because opponents feared, among other things, that he would energetically attack abortion rights.

In principle there is nothing wrong with political blocking, even if doing so stems entirely from one particular issue. Would we now condemn a senator who, prior to the Civil War, voted against a nominee solely on the grounds that the candidate favored slavery? I would hope not.

Yet many people sneer at the notion of litmus tests for purposes of judicial selection or confirmation--even as they unknowingly conduct such tests themselves.

Litmus tests of all sorts are scattered about the judicial-selection process. When senators ask a nominee whether he or she believes that the proper role of a judge is to interpret rather than make law, or whether the Eighth Amendment should be deemed to prohibit capital punishment--all the while silently insisting upon an expected formulaic reply--they are imposing a litmus test.

Today, a candidate would not be nominated, much less confirmed, if he or she failed to genuflect convincingly to Marbury v. Madison (which established the authority of the Supreme Court to invalidate an act of Congress deemed to be in conflict with the Constitution), Brown v. Board of Education (which invalidated de jure racial segregation in public primary and secondary schools), or other once-controversial decisions that have become so thoroughly a part of the conventional wisdom that we no longer even perceive reactions to them as litmus tests of acceptability.

Since senators (and the public as a whole) should feel free to object to a nominee on political grounds, they should also feel free to demand that nominees truthfully divulge thinking that bears upon relevant judicial matters. Nominees--both liberals and conservatives--often claim that they cannot answer certain questions because to do so would be to prejudge a matter that may come before them.

But that response is typically a mere dodge to avoid controversy. Senators need not accept this.

If a
candidate refuses to answer relevant questions, senators should take that refusal into consideration when determining whether to vote to confirm. It makes no sense to offer lifetime tenure and all the power of judicial review to candidates whose thinking about crucial matters is unknown.

A transparent process in which ideological objections to judicial candidates are candidly voiced is a much-needed antidote to the murky "politics of personal destruction. "When politicians (again, both liberal and conservative) feel disabled from objecting to candidates on ideological grounds, they search high and low for pretexts on which to object: "He made this lewd statement to a colleague a decade ago," or "She committed this technical infraction of law."

Senators should not feel that they have to reveal or attack some personal blemish in order to justify a vote against a nominee. A deep, urgent, political disagreement is sufficient. It should be possible for a senator to acknowledge that a nominee is honorable, competent, and kind while still voting against confirmation because of the way the candidate would likely act as a judge. Nothing personal. Just politics.

Halting the Judgernaut

Alexander Wohl

As Capitol Hill adjusts to Vermont Senator Jim Jeffords's earthshaking repudiation of the Republican Party, the Senate Judiciary Committee is bracing itself to be the center of the aftershocks. The judicial branch of government, after all, is where a president is likely to have his most far-reaching impact; the judges he appoints will last much longer than the one or two terms he serves. And the Judiciary Committee--which is a key venue for debate about potent legislative issues such as abortion, school prayer, flag burning, and civil rights--is also the primary battleground in judicial-confirmation fights. Thus, with George W. Bush's first slate of nominees for the federal bench waiting for hearings, the most resounding political clashes of the summer are likely to occur on the Judiciary Committee's turf.

When Jeffords abandoned the Republicans, he threw control of Senate committees to the Democratic Party, providing Dems on the Judiciary Committee with the power to strangulate nominations in committee. (Actually, as of this writing, Republicans--aware of how defiantly they refused to allow many of Bill Clinton's nominations to get beyond the Judiciary Committee, and afraid of payback--are trying to force the Democrats to permit a full Senate vote for every judiciary nominee. A politically foolish position that will likely come to a quick resolution, this could bring all Senate business to a halt.) Given a free hand to nominate and confirm judges, Bush and the Senate Republicans would no doubt populate the federal bench with an army of Antonin Scalia clones--a legion of judges who, though perhaps ethnically diverse, share the extreme views of the Court's most conservative jurist. Indeed, the first batch of nominees the president sent to the Senate for confirmation has already made this clear. One logical response to such nominees would seem to be simply to block their consideration--especially since that was the Republican response to Clinton nominees whom the GOP considered to be too liberal.

But early signs indicate that the newly Democrat-controlled Judiciary Committee, along with the Senate as a whole, is taking a less direct and more wide-ranging approach, one that makes use of several different strategies at once while trying to minimize the danger of a public backlash. This highlights an important question , Is it worth letting all but the most conservative judges onto the federal bench--where they will preside for lifetime appointments, potentially lending important appeals courts a conservative coloration for up to 30 or 40 years--in order not to appear "obstructionist"? For some Democrats concerned with winning re-election, the answer may be yes. Still, if they're smart and stick together, the Democrats on the Judiciary Committee may be able to ensure that only the more moderate of Bush's nominees come to a full Senate vote--and to demonstrate the wisdom of their case to the American public.

"Don't Mess with Vermont"

How successful the Democrats are in preventing the confirmation of conservative judges will depend heavily on the committee's new chairman. A soft-spoken, liberal Vermonter, Patrick Leahy is a 27-year Senate veteran who has distinguished himself from many of his colleagues with his integrity and lack of ego. Smart and unafraid to play political hardball when necessary, he is adept at diffusing tension with gentle humor. (The day after the Jeffords switch, for example, "Don't Mess with Vermont" bumper stickers--attributed to Leahy--appeared around Washington, D.C.)

Leahy replaces Utah Senator Orrin Hatch--a fierce conservative whose favorite topic in recent committee sessions has been his own evenhandedness--as the ranking majority member on the committee. (Transcripts of recent hearings reveal Hatch to be remarkably, repetitively taken with his own "fairness.") Though Hatch has worked with Democrats on occasion, he fights hard for conservative Republican nominees and has the battle scars from the Robert Bork and Clarence Thomas Supreme Court nominations to prove it.

Leahy and Hatch consider themselves close friends and generally work well together. During Hatch's quixotic presidential run through early 2000, Leahy offered "to speak for him or against him, whichever would help more." But beneath this geniality, both sides are girding for war. Within days of Jeffords's announcement, Hatch was warning Democrats that "nobody's going to push me around." Leahy, for his part, has shown himself unafraid to take on the Republicans: He has challenged the GOP's hypocritical statements about the "quick pace" of Clinton nominations during Republican control of the committee and engineered a walkout from a hearing in which he felt the Republicans were trying to strong-arm Democrats into approving Bush nominees.

But for the first time in seven years, the Democrats have the numbers--if not literally (at this writing, the Senate leadership is negotiating whether the party balance on the committee will remain evenly split or a Democrat will be added to give the Dems a one-person advantage), then at least in terms of power. Majority status gives Leahy the gavel--and with it, the power to schedule and time hearings. Democrats now control the process: They decide when (and even if) nominees are brought up, how zealously they are interrogated, and how quickly they get voted on. And Senate Democratic aides say that Leahy is ready to take a much tougher line than others have in the past.

The recent debate over Ted Olson's nomination as solicitor general suggests how potent the Democrats' new majority status on the committee can be, if only they can muster the courage to exercise it. Erstwhile Senate Majority Leader Trent Lott was forced to discharge Olson's nomination from the Judiciary Committee (he did this under the bargain struck relating to the 50–50 Senate divide) the day Jeffords announced his switch: Lott knew that if he waited, the Democrats could use their new power in the Judiciary Committee to withhold the nomination from the floor. Moreover, after seeing Olson get voted in by the Senate--albeit by a razor-thin majority--Democrats surely understand that stopping someone is easier in committee than on the Senate floor, where there is the danger that some conservative Democrats will join the Republicans in crucial votes, as Georgia's Zell Miller and Nebraska's Ben Nelson did on Olson.

But now that the Democrats possess the power in the Judiciary Committee, will they be willing to use it? After failing to block Attorney General John Ashcroft and Solicitor General Olson, some Democrats said, in effect, "Well, we got enough votes to demonstrate that we could block a nomination--but we didn't do it because these were only cabinet appointments, not Supreme Court justices, which are lifetime appointments." Fair enough. But lower-court federal judges get appointed for life, too. Do the Democrats have the will to scrutinize and oppose district and circuit court candidates?

Whom to Oppose?

Democrats are still strategizing about whom they should oppose. This requires a calculated analysis not just of the nominees' records and the courts for which the judges have been nominated, but of public opinion. Democrats have seen how the perception of obstructionism or intransigence has sometimes hurt the Republicans--most notably after the government shutdown in 1995, during Clinton's impeachment in 1998, and last month when the GOP lost Jeffords--and don't want to be perceived that way themselves.

Both Leahy and the new majority leader, South Dakota's Tom Daschle, have said that they will work to prevent an ideological court packing and that they want "good, moderate, middle-of- the-road, credible" nominees. But already a number of Bush's nominees fall outside that description. This is particularly significant right now, because--after years of Republicans stonewalling Bill

Clinton's nominees--there are many vacancies, including 31 openings on federal appeals courts. Several circuit courts of appeal are very closely divided between liberals and conservatives. (The tiny First Circuit, for example, whose six judges cover Maine, Massachusetts, New Hampshire, Rhode Island, and Puerto Rico, has one opening and leans barely Republican; and the Third Circuit, which includes Delaware, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, and the Virgin Islands, is evenly divided and has two vacancies.) Just a few Bush appointees could tilt the judicial balance of the country in a decidedly conservative direction for a long time to come.

So Democrats considering circuit court nominees need to examine not just whether the prospective lifetime appointee has views so extreme as to be out of the mainstream, but whether adding that person to a court will change the ideological complexion of a particular circuit.

Given these parameters, there are several clear targets among the first group of Bush nominees. For instance, two Fourth Circuit nominees cry out for opposition. Terrence Boyle, chief judge of the U.S. District Court of the Eastern District of North Carolina, is a former aide to Senator Jesse Helms and, not surprisingly, is extremely conservative. He was already denied a spot on the court of appeals in 1991, when he was nominated by President George H.W. Bush, but the Senate did not act on his nomination. Helms retaliated by blocking all of President Clinton's nominees to fill North Carolina's Fourth Circuit vacancies. (Helms's desire to get Boyle on the court is ironic given Helms's repeated statements over the past several years that "there is no need to put more judges on that court because to do so would make it less efficient.")

The other nominee to the Fourth Circuit, South Carolina District Judge Dennis Shedd, is equally conservative; he served as chief counsel and staff director under former Judiciary Committee Chairman Strom Thurmond, who is now a senior committee member. Although Shedd has already attracted much opposition from civil rights groups, it will require coordinated strength to block him, given the tradition of deference to nominees who once worked in the Senate, even if only in a staff capacity.

But the Fourth Circuit already tilts heavily to the right. In contrast, the Sixth Circuit (which covers Michigan, Ohio, Tennessee, and Kentucky) and the D.C. Circuit are closely divided. Thus, Miguel Estrada, nominated for the D.C. Circuit, and Jeffrey Sutton, nominated for the Sixth, are judicial conservatives whom Democrats could confidently and appropriately oppose.

After the Supreme Court, the D.C Circuit is generally seen as the most powerful court in the nation, because of its role in interpreting statutes and agency decisions and because it has historically served as a springboard for potential Supreme Court nominees. Adding Estrada--who was a law partner of Ted Olson and is known for sharing the judicial philosophy of Justices Scalia and Thomas--to that court, along with another Bush nominee, the conservative John Roberts, would significantly enhance a slight conservative majority on this key bench.

The Sixth Circuit is even more closely divided. A former state solicitor from Ohio, Sutton--who has argued a number of times in the Supreme Court for expanded state power and for voiding congressional initiatives--has already been the focus of opposition. But another Sixth Circuit nominee, Ohio Supreme Court Justice Deborah Cook, also deserves a close look. In one representative decision, she denied a blind woman's request to be admitted to medical school because of the undue burden it would have placed on the school.

The 10th Circuit (which covers Colorado, Kansas, New Mexico, Oklahoma, Utah, & Wyoming) also is narrowly divided. The nomination to this court of Michael McConnell, a Federalist Society conservative and a professor at the University of Utah, has already generated opposition because of his extremist interpretation of the religion clauses of the First Amendment and their potential application to a variety of social issues ranging from school vouchers to gay rights.

Democrats can prevent Bush's nominees from being confirmed in several ways. First, of course, is to vote them down, either in committee or on the floor. Second is to delay their confirmation hearings indefinitely, as the Republicans did for so many Clinton nominees. (A variation on this option is to use control of the process to lengthen investigative hearings when that would be effective.) Expect Leahy to make use of both tactics. But more important is a third approach, which is to avoid nasty committee fights and use the potential power of a unified Democratic majority--for now, the committee will follow the caucus party line and vote up or down together--to influence the White House not to nominate right-wingers in the first place. It is therefore incumbent on the Bush White House, which until now has given only lip service to the idea of consultation with the Senate, to work with Leahy and the Democrats if it wants its nominees to be confirmed in a timely fashion.

Finally, several changes in procedure will slow down the process while adding an opportunity for more information and fairness. Leahy has already promised to reinstate the use of evaluations by the American Bar Association before any hearings. (This nonpartisan analysis of candidates, which every president since Dwight D. Eisenhower has used in considering nominees, was eliminated by George W. Bush.) Leahy is also likely to hold quick hearings for less controversial nominees and for nominees who are designated for courts with the greatest need before turning to the possible challenges. In this way, he can accumulate public support that he can later use in opposing the more conservative or controversial nominees. And he will probably not hold hearings for more than one nominee at a time--something that makes abundant sense but that the Republicans failed to do.

The prevailing view has been that nominees are presumed to be confirmable, unless senators or interest groups find something "wrong" with them. Some legal scholars have proposed the idea of requiring nominees to demonstrate why they should be confirmed, and there are signs that Leahy is open to this approach.

The Senate has an important role to play in evaluating and challenging individuals who are being appointed to a lifetime job of interpreting the Constitution. While Republicans are likely to cry "Bork!" whenever a nominee is criticized (even though the same Democratically controlled Congress that rejected Bork overwhelmingly confirmed Scalia), Democrats should not shy away from opposing any (and even many) of President Bush's nominees. Nor should they be tempted to give free passes to minority candidates if those candidates are too conservative. The Constitution says that the Senate will give its advice and consent on all nominations. Most Americans don't want a judiciary slanted sharply in either direction. We will soon see whether the new majority in the Senate has the guts and the ability to make a credible case to the American people that President Bush should not have the unilateral authority to shape the judicial branch in his conservative image.

At High Court, a Retirement Watch

Rehnquist, O'Connor Top List of Possibilities as Speculation on Replacement Grows
Charles Lane and Amy Goldstein

As the Supreme Court prepares to end its term this month, the White House, the Senate and interest groups across the ideological spectrum are preparing for the possibility that a member of the court might retire, with Chief Justice William H. Rehnquist's departure the most frequently mentioned scenario.

There is no direct evidence that Rehnquist, 76, or any other member of the court is planning to step down this year. Justice Sandra Day O'Connor, 71, recently dampened speculation about her departure, making an unusual announcement that she had "no plans" to leave. When Rehnquist was asked through the Supreme Court press office for a similar statement, he declined to comment.

Now that a Republican occupies the White House for the first time in eight years, however, court observers consider it more likely that Rehnquist or O'Connor, who were both longtime activists in Arizona Republican politics before being appointed to the court by Republican presidents, will step down sometime in the next few years.

"Make no mistake," said one longtime friend of the chief justice, Rehnquist would prefer to "return" his seat to a Republican president. But another justice recently told a friend there was no suggestion around the court that a departure is imminent.

Similarly, a lawyer who has regular contact with the White House counsel's office said, "I don't see the kind of frenzied activity by people who would be involved" in the administration if they knew a retirement were looming. In the past, many justices have directly or indirectly relayed their departure plans to the White House slightly before announcing them publicly, often at the end of the term.

Nonetheless, the thought of stepping down apparently has at least crossed Rehnquist's mind. When PBS interviewer Charlie Rose asked in February if he could imagine retiring, Rehnquist replied, "Sure."
Justice John Paul Stevens, 81, is older than Rehnquist and O'Connor, and he also was appointed by a Republican president, Gerald R. Ford, in 1975. But Stevens is not considered a likely candidate for retirement. He remains in vigorous health -- and, though still nominally a

Republican, has moved to the left in his years on the court. He dissented vigorously from last year's court decision, spearheaded by its most conservative members, to stop the Florida recount and effectively ensure Bush's victory.

There have been no changes in membership at the Supreme Court since Stephen G. Breyer replaced Harry Blackmun in the fall of 1994, creating the second-longest period of stability in the court's history and pent-up anxiety about when the next vacancy will occur.

In such an uncertain climate, the administration, Congress and advocacy groups are keenly sensitive to the opportunity President Bush will have to shape the court -- one of the presidency's most enduring powers. The White House and the Justice Department have been working for months to define the factors that would go into choosing a nominee, as well as beginning to sift through potential candidates.

"We are working hard to be prepared," said White House Counsel Alberto R. Gonzales, who oversees the selection process and is himself a potential choice. "Even during the transition we began thinking about possible nominees to the court."

On Capitol Hill, Republicans on the Senate Judiciary Committee have already begun "informal discussions and talks" about potential candidates, said Makan Delrahim, the committee's GOP staff director.

In the meantime, conservative and liberal advocacy groups have been working aggressively to try to influence the president's eventual choice -- and public opinion. Conservatives have been urging Bush not to back down from his campaign statements that the current justices he most admires are Antonin Scalia and Clarence Thomas, the members furthest to the right.

"We are looking to him to stay as close to that standard and as consistently close to that standard as he can," said Thomas L. Jipping, director of the judicial selection monitoring project of the Free Congress Foundation.

On the left, civil rights groups and women's organizations have been trying to stoke public fears that Bush's impact on the court could have dire consequences on issues ranging from abortion to education to affirmative action.

"If George W. Bush follows through on his promise to the right wing and nominates someone in the mode of Scalia and Thomas and Rehnquist, then there is going to be an epic battle," said Ralph Neas, president of People for the American Way.

The ideological skirmish that has broken out in Congress during the last month over Bush's initial nominees to lower federal courts is widely considered a prelude to the full-scale battle that a Supreme Court opening could create.

According to aides in the administration and on Capitol Hill, the cross pressures on the president in making his selection will be intense. On the one hand, the shift of the Senate this month to

Democratic control, analysts say, could hinder Bush's prospects for securing a replacement as conservative as Rehnquist. At the same time, the GOP's right wing is insistent that the president must not reduce conservative strength on the court by nominating anyone more liberal than Rehnquist.

"The difficulty is that the president has got to decide, 'How much political capital am I willing to bleed for a controversial Supreme Court nominee?' " said a conservative legal expert.

In such a contentious environment, names that have been considered among Judiciary Committee Republicans, sources said, include federal appeals court judges Emilio Garza, Edith H. Jones and J. Michael Luttig and the committee's ranking Republican, Sen. Orrin G. Hatch (Utah).

Other possibilities the president might favor, a variety of sources say, include conservative appeals court judges J. Harvie Wilkinson and Frank H. Easterbrook and Washington lawyers John G. Roberts and Miguel Estrada, both nominated by Bush last month to the federal appeals court here.

Bush also could look to members of Congress, such as Sen. Jon Kyl (R-Ariz.) or Rep. Christopher Cox (R-Calif.), who was being considered by the White House this spring for an appeals court seat but withdrew from consideration because of opposition from California's Democratic senators.

Administration officials declined to confirm any candidates they are contemplating. Bush has indicated he would like to nominate the first Hispanic justice, a move that might help him woo Latino voters in 2004 and improve his chances of winning confirmation in the Senate. In that context, Gonzales, a former justice on the Texas Supreme Court and a confidant of Bush's, is considered a prime candidate.

Asked whether he might accept a nomination, Gonzales said: "I am asked this question a lot. I typically say I don't intend to be a candidate. . . . My focus is working here, serving this president in this capacity."

Some conservatives consider Gonzales too moderate, and others view him as lacking the experience to become chief justice. To allay such concerns, Bush could make a double switch, nominating a current member of the court -- perhaps O'Connor --to replace the chief justice and naming Gonzales an associate justice.

"Politically, nothing beats that pair," said a lawyer who knows several of the justices personally.

Rehnquist's departure would not be as politically momentous as that of O'Connor, who is a swing vote on the closely divided court. Rehnquist is a consistent conservative, so the prospect of an equally conservative Bush-nominated successor for him would merely reinforce the existing ideological mix.

"If O'Connor is stepping down, then there will be all these arguments . . . about the balance of the court," said Terry Eastland, publisher of the conservative Weekly Standard and a senior Justice Department official in the Reagan administration. "With Rehnquist, the Democrats might be more willing to defer to the president in terms of judicial philosophy."

By regaining control of the Senate, the Democrats now run the Judiciary Committee, which will largely determine how quickly a nomination is processed -- and how much the nominee is grilled about his or her judicial philosophy.

Some Senate Democrats have begun discussing whether they would even employ a filibuster or other procedural tactics to block a Bush appointee from being voted on by the full Senate -- a sharp departure from past practice. In 1987, Robert H. Bork was allowed a vote on the Senate floor, even after the Democratic-controlled Judiciary Committee rejected him. Bork lost the floor vote, 58 to 42.

Rehnquist has been on the court since 1972, when he became an associate justice under President Richard M. Nixon. President Ronald Reagan elevated Rehnquist to chief justice in 1986, to replace the retiring Warren E. Burger.

In a recent interview with Fox News, Rehnquist said he had thought of departing before he was tapped to be chief justice. He acknowledged he has been having trouble lately remembering names and sent this wistful message to his television audience: "I'll tell them this, that I just think I've been extraordinarily fortunate in my life, and I'm very grateful for my good fortune."

Rehnquist's health, particularly severe back pain, has been a problem in the past. Although he still must rise from the bench and stretch his back during the court's two-hour oral argument sessions, he now appears to be in good physical and mental condition.

Under Rehnquist, a five-member conservative majority on the court has moved the law in a decidedly conservative direction, trimming affirmative action, clearing legal obstacles to the application of capital punishment, and limiting federal authority over the states.

Asked during the PBS interview if it would make a difference to him that there is a Republican in the White House, Rehnquist did not answer directly but did concede that there had "traditionally" been a "slight preference" by justices to retire during administrations of the party that appointed them.

Daschle's 'Intensive Care Unit' to Attend to Patients' Rights

John Lancaster and Helen Dewar

 EXCERPT ***

REV_00127701

POWER PLAY: The Senate has once again gone into overtime in trying to nail down the fine points of its shifting power balance, delaying approval of a new resolution on committee organization because of an unresolved dispute over the handling of judicial nominations.

Without an agreement, freshman senators are left without committee assignments, many Democratic committee chairmen have to operate with Republican majorities -- and President Bush will have to wait awhile longer for action on his nominees.

The reason is that the power-sharing agreement negotiated when the Senate was evenly divided lapsed when Democrats took control this month, meaning that committee organization reverts to what it was at the end of the 106th Congress -- until a new agreement is reached.

After two weeks of quiet, behind-the-scenes negotiations, Republicans went public last week with demands for a guarantee that Supreme Court nominees will come to the Senate floor for a vote and for public disclosure when nominees are blocked by their home-state senators under the "blue slip" process. They said they asked Majority Leader Daschle to put the two proposals to a vote by the Senate, and he refused.

Later, Daschle issued a statement saying he has made both public and private commitments to "assuring a fair process for judicial nominees" and wants to resolve remaining organizational issues "through negotiations and discussions, rather than with potentially divisive votes."

On a party-line vote, which is customary on votes related to party powers, the GOP proposals would be defeated 51-49. But Republicans could claim a moral high ground in favor of full disclosure and fair treatment for a new president's nominees.

Senate Majority Leader Tom Daschle on Judicial Nominations
Tony Snow, Juan Williams

WILLIAMS: Senator Daschle, since Mr. Jeffords has come over, at least for caucus purposes, with the Democrats, there's been no reorganization of the Senate. So I'm wondering, how are you operating? And what pressures are there on you, as the Senate majority leader, to in fact now reach some deal with the Republicans so that you can get back to business?

DASCHLE: Well, Juan, I've told my Republican colleagues that I'm not going to jam them, I'm going to give them time to sort this out. These transitions are never easy. It took Senator Lott and I a couple of months to work out power-sharing.

But this is nothing compared to what we had to work through with power-sharing. That was unprecedented. The circumstances now are certainly not unprecedented, and we went through a lot of the same types of questions in the 1950s. Ao this is really a matter of whether we have the one-vote majority in committees, whether or not we revert back to power-sharing if something would change, whether or not we can work (Publication page references are not available for this document.) out staff and budgets. I think we can, and I think we're getting closer.

WILLIAMS: Well, now, what about the pressure coming from the GOP to say, listen, we want some assurances, we want them written down, and, in specific, concern about judicial nominations and the fact that they not get bottled up in committee but be able to reach to the Senate floor for a full vote?

DASCHLE: Well, I have said over and over that we're going to be fair. We are determined not to engage in any payback. We're not going to do what we think in many cases was done to our nominees in the last eight years. That isn't what we're all about.

What we want to do is move forward, assure that there are votes. But we don't want to abrogate the constitutional process of advice and consent, to make sure, absolutely certain that the judiciary committee has the prerogative and has the responsibility that it's been charged to take on. And that's what this is about.

SNOW: But, Senator, the constitutional obligation is for the entire Senate, it's not the Senate Judiciary Committee. And the founders never said, well, we want the Judicial Committee to decide who gets to serve as judges.

What have you told Republicans, other than that you'd be fair? Specifically, what have you promised them?

DASCHLE: Well, what I've promised them, Tony, is that we were going to assure them that every nominee, regardless of whether it's judiciary or executive, will have a fair hearing, will have an opportunity to be considered, and I can't go any further than that.

Obviously, we don't want to see happen what happened over the last five years, where some judges were kept without even the opportunity to be heard for over four years; where some senators, because you had secret holds, were given no opportunity to have the right to be considered and to be voted on. We're not going to do that. I don't think we should do that.

But I'm not going to engage or commit to an extralegal process that says, in some cases, regardless of what the Judiciary Committee does, we're going to bypass the committee and go straight to the floor.

SNOW: Why not? That's the agreement you just had.

REV_00127703

DASCHLE: No, no, I don't think we've ever had an agreement of that kind.

SNOW: Did you not have an agreement that, when you had the 50-50 power-sharing agreement, that nominations would go to the Senate floor?

DASCHLE: No, what we had was an agreement that either the majority or the minority leader could make a motion to proceed to a nomination. And I obviously would be willing to look at something like that. But never did we have an automatic commitment that any nominee or any bill would come straight to the floor.

Senator Joe Biden on Judicial Nominations

Tim Russert

MR. RUSSERT: You're also a member of the Senate Judiciary Committee.

SEN. BIDEN: I am.

MR. RUSSERT: Harry Reid, Democratic senator from Nevada and a colleague of yours, said the other day, talking about the Supreme Court: "We may wind up with another Scalia. Even though I disagree with the result of some of his opinions, his ability to reason is about as good as I've ever seen. I'm not looking for another Antonin Scalia, but I think that he brings with him such an intriguing background and such a brilliant ability to reason, that if we had someone like him, it would be a tougher decision for the Senate."

SEN. BIDEN: Wouldn't be tough for me at all. I've spoken to Justice Scalia. I consider us good acquaintances. So we kid each other occasionally when he--like, for example, I got a note or a call, I can't recall which, saying when the special prosecutor thing was--when we all voted against it, you know, reinstating, he called and says, "See, I was right the first time in the Morrison vs. Olson case."

I teach constitutional law--he called me and said, "I better come up and help you with those students. They're getting the wrong idea." As I've said to him, bluntly, I regret--the two most regrettable decisions I made were voting for him and voting for Reagan's tax cut.

MR. RUSSERT: Scalia was confirmed 98-to-nothing.

SEN. BIDEN: No--he was, but you--remember the context then? The context was we had a governor named Mario Cuomo saying he'd kick anybody's rear-end who didn't vote for the Italian. And, you know, remember he didn't answer any questions and no one forced him to answer any questions. Look, the fact that someone is brilliant does not qualify them to be on the Supreme Court. They can be brilliant and wrong. I would like--for example, I think it's important there is a Scalia on the court. I'd like another Brennan on the court, as well. But if you want someone who's brilliant in his reasoning, equally as consequential, I'd take Souter. He's equally as bright as Scalia. Writes better than...

MR. RUSSERT: As chief justice.

SEN. BIDEN: As chief justice.

MR. RUSSERT: You don't believe the Democrats would ever support Scalia to be chief justice of the Supreme Court?

SEN. BIDEN: I'm not speaking to the Democrats. I'm speaking for me. His view of the Constitution, that there are no unenumerated rights in the Constitution, that there's a very--this is the most activist Supreme Court we've had in the history of the United States of America, Tim. They have--they're the only court that has ever declared unconstitutional seven national pieces of legislation. People don't know. They declared, for example, the Older Americans Act unconstitutional as it applies to states.

MR. RUSSERT: But doesn't George Bush have a right to have conservatives on the Supreme Court?

SEN. BIDEN: Sure, he does. And I have a right to have who I want. This is what they call, you know, co-equal branches of government.

MR. RUSSERT: A liberal litmus test?

SEN. BIDEN: No, no. No, no, no. You're putting words in my mouth. You said, "Does he have a right to have conservatives?" To the degree that he pushes to the right, I can push to the center or to the left. The Constitution says that the United States Senate gets to determine--he gets to pick, his is to propose, ours is to dispose. We have from Rutledge back in the turn of the century with George Washington straight on through. We've rejected people whose views we believe are out of sync with what the Senate is.

I was asked advice by President Clinton when he had a chance to put people on the court. I went down to see him. I said, "Mr. President, when there's a divided government, you should pick someone in the middle. You should understand that." And he did. My advice to the president of the United States is if he wants a holy war, he can do that and pick another Scalia. But there's a divided government. The nation is divided on these issues. He should pick someone who is a centrist. He can be center right, but to pick someone on the extreme left or right would be a serious mistake, in my opinion.

Two Superior Judges Merit Confirmation

Jim Petro, Ohio State Auditor (Editorial)

During the 2000 presidential campaign, President Bush promised that he would nominate for federal judgeships only people of the highest integrity and professional competence and who possess the proper judicial temperament. Recently, Bush began delivering on that promise by nominating 11 men and women from across the country from both political parties for seats on the various federal courts of appeal.

Ohioans should be proud that for the first two of seven vacancies on the 6th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals, which covers Ohio, Michigan, Kentucky and Tennessee, the president nominated two outstanding Ohioans to serve on that bench: Ohio Supreme Court Justice Deborah L. Cook and former state solicitor Jeffrey S. Sutton.

As former assistant prosecutor, city law director in Rocky River and lawyer in private practice for the past 28 years, it has been my pleasure and privilege to have appeared before and practiced with thousands of judges and attorneys throughout the state. Without a doubt, Cook and Sutton are among the best-qualified lawyers to serve in the federal judiciary that I have seen in my legal career.

After a distinguished 13-year career in private practice in Akron, Cook joined the Ohio Court of Appeals in 1991, where she quickly developed an excellent reputation for her hard work and for the quality of her opinions. Elected and re-elected to the Ohio Supreme Court in 1994 and 2000, Cook has been praised by The Dispatch for her "keen intellect" and "careful legal scholarship."

The newspaper noted that she applies the law "without fear or favor" in crafting rulings that are governed by the Constitution and not by popularity polls or special interests.

Sutton graduated first in his class at Ohio State University Law School and served as a law clerk for two different U.S. Supreme Court justices, a rare honor. As Ohio's state solicitor, he was responsible for arguing cases of the utmost importance to Ohioans before both the Ohio and the U.S. Supreme Courts.

A prolific legal scholar, Sutton has written more than 50 law review articles and two legal texts. While keeping his private practice in Columbus, he also is teaching constitutional law at OSU law school.

When Bush submitted his nominees for the federal appeals courts to the U.S. Senate for confirmation, he called upon senators of both parties to restore civility and dignity to the confirmation process, and, most importantly, he asked for a prompt vote on each nominee.

Right now the court, based in Cincinnati, is critically short of judges to handle an ever-expanding caseload. Because of their impeccable credentials, Cook and Sutton should be swiftly confirmed.

Lack of News Makes Pontificating Difficult but Not Impossible

Joe Hallett, Dispatch Politics Editor

A big patch of white space, a fast-closing deadline and an empty head. Mid- June and the dog days are here already. Will loyal readers -- both of them -- notice if there is no column this week? Can't do commentary without some news. It's plain dead around here.

Speaking of death, maybe column grist could be ground from the pending U.S. Supreme Court case on whether mentally ill murderers should be executed. But what's the point now? We already killed schizophrenic Jay D. Scott.

The legal system, though, is always column fodder, and it would be timely to discuss President Bush's nomination of Columbus attorney Jeffrey Sutton to the 6th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals in Cincinnati.

But that has to do more with the political system, and editors are always griping that readers don't care about politics. Why waste a column on it? So what if the new Democratic majority in the U.S. Senate, for its own partisan aggrandizement, stands ready to ravage Sutton's reputation?

So what if the Democrats are salivating to tar Sutton unfairly as an uncompassionate conservative for having the audacity to argue successfully before the U.S. Supreme Court that the Constitution limits the ability of citizens to sue state governments for discrimination against the disabled?

Does anyone think for a moment that Senate Democrats will care that Sutton, at age 40, suffers from osteoarthritis, a degenerative disease that eventually would have put him in a wheelchair, if not for the miracle of hip- replacement surgery?

Will Senate Democrats give a hoot that Sutton, a brilliant attorney by virtually everyone's account, has a history of performing free legal work for social causes and groups? He has argued, pro bono, on behalf of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People, the Anti-Defamation League of B'nai B'rith, the Center for the Prevention of Handgun Violence and the American Civil Liberties Union.

Not long ago, Sutton took up the cause of a Chillicothe prison inmate and won a 9-0 decision from the U.S. Supreme Court, the ninth case in five years he had argued before the high court, probably more than any other private attorney.

Senate Democrats won't care. They're bent on getting back at Republicans for confirming only 61 percent of President Clinton's judicial nominees. When and if the Democrats give Sutton a hearing, they'll be more concerned about placating the constituencies who larder their coffers than putting a fair, honest person on the federal bench.

In a hearing process that too often has turned well-meaning nominees from both parties into bitter and spiteful judges -- Supreme Court Justice Clarence Thomas comes to mind --Sutton will be put through the political wringer, used and abused, to signal Bush that his Supreme Court nominees can expect even tougher treatment.

But, heck, nobody is interested in such political shenanigans except for maybe both readers of this column.

Well, then, there is the school-funding case. The Ohio Supreme Court will hear arguments Wednesday. For a third time, the court is expected to rule 4-3 that the legislature and governor failed to ensure an adequate and equitable education for Ohio's schoolchildren.

Lawyers for the state hope to turn one of two Republican justices, Paul E. Pfeifer or Andrew Douglas, who formed the majority with two Democrats in the previous decisions. A victory for the financially insatiable coalition of schools almost certainly will mean higher taxes.

The school-funding case has been around for 10 years. Yesterday's news is boring.

Oh, yeah, there's the Big Three Republican feud at the Statehouse. But that, too, is insider politics. Speaker Larry Householder of Glenford and Senate President Richard H. Finan of Cincinnati had their way with Gov. Bob Taft on the state budget and now they are poised to embarrass the governor by overriding some of his 49 vetoes.

Obviously, Taft's re-election in 2002 is not a high priority for Republicans controlling the General Assembly. For that matter, it appears not to be a high priority for Taft. While getting pushed around by legislative Republicans, he declined to use the bully pulpit to defend his own reasonable budget proposal, one that would not have gutted higher education.

Taft may have trouble telling voters what he stands for next year. But that's then and this is now, and there is nothing going on.

Unless, of course, anyone considers the latest scandal at the Ohio Department of Job and Family

REV_00127708

Services worthy of comment. News flash: Department illegally withholds more child-support payments from poor children. Routine stuff.

Maybe a column could be crafted around the big-money push at the Statehouse to permit video-gambling machines at Ohio's seven horse racetracks. But thanks to Taft, that's dead for the moment. Maybe something could be written about all the wacko legislation that right-wingers in the House want to pass. But why dignify wackiness?

My gosh, look at the time! All this white space to fill and nothing to write. Will somebody please make some news around here?

Heat Turned Up High in Judicial Kitchen

Russ Pulliam

He's been there, done that.

Federal Judge Daniel Manion recommends a thick skin and some experience in rough-and-tumble political battles for potentially controversial judicial nominees. President Bush already has submitted some nominations for federal court positions for U.S. Senate confirmation. But the big battle is yet to come with an anticipated opening on the U.S. Supreme Court in the next year or so.

When Manion was nominated by President Ronald Reagan for the 7th Circuit Court of Appeals in 1986, the mild-mannered former state senator from South Bend was surprised to become the center of controversy. The Manion battle was a warm-up for bigger ones over subsequent nominations of Robert Bork and Clarence Thomas for the Supreme Court.

Manion was blasted by People for the American Way and Senate Democrats for being unqualified for the court position. Sen. Edward Kennedy called him "the least-qualified" nominee he had ever seen for the federal appeals court. His critics found fault with his proof-reading because of errors in his correspondence.

Yet Manion also attracted endorsements from liberal Democrats who knew him back in Indiana. He made it to the bench after close votes in the Senate.

Manion understood that his critics weren't aiming the mud-slinging at him personally. What they really objected to was his willingness to look to the original intent of the Constitution. But he worries that mud-slinging campaigns that got worse under Bork and Thomas could deter qualified people from serving on the courts.

"I had a much thicker skin politically," he said in a recent interview. "I understood what was going on."

Good lawyers can make more money in private practice. "Why should I subject myself to this kind of attack?" he can hear potential candidates say. "I don't need to have my name dragged through the mud. Who knows what they'll come up with -- what kind of magazines you subscribe to. That's the kind of drivel it descends to," Manion added.

Critics might suggest that those who can't stand the heat should stay out of the judicial kitchen. But the judicial branch traditionally has been set above the partisan politics of the legislative and executive branches. Until the Bork-Thomas controversies, a long tradition was to evaluate court nominees on the basis of competence and personal character.

Manion has had the last word with the critics who attacked his alleged incompetence. "He made a liar out of them," commented a court colleague, William Bauer. "He is very bright, hard-working, thoughtful. Our job is to make sure we follow the Constitution. That's what he does very well."

Another Indiana lawyer, Peter Rusthoven, was associate counsel during the Reagan administration and gained an insider's perspective on the court nomination process. He suggests that more ideological battles over these nominations will undermine confidence in the courts as impartial decision-makers.

"Judicial nominations are no longer about, is this person smart, well-trained in the law, hard-working," he said. "Instead, you're nominating a person who is going to have one vote in a super-legislature, and that super-legislature is going to decide all kinds of things that the courts traditionally never decided."

With activist judges "writing" laws, the executive and legislative branches lose their chance to settle controversial political and social issues. Rusthoven is hoping for more strict constructionist judges who will be willing to defer issues back to the legislative branch when no clear constitutional issues are at stake.

He points to the 1857 Dred Scott decision as a notorious example of judicial activism, with the court taking over the slavery issue by ruling that blacks were not citizens. "It severely minimized the possibility of working out the slavery issue in the elected or political branches of government," he said. "It took away from the Congress the ability to regulate slavery in the territories."

The Senate ought to give Bush the green light to nominate strict-constructionist judges for the high court. A few more of them could help take the court out of some of the controversial political issues that are better left to the two elected branches of government.

Reason to Reject

Elizabeth Cavendish, Legal Director, NARAL

We take exception to the belief that it is unfair to challenge the qualifications of judicial nominee John G. Roberts Jr. based upon antiabortion briefs he filed as a government lawyer [editorial, June 7].

Mr. Roberts was a political appointee in the Reagan administration and served as principal deputy solicitor general for President Bush from 1989 to 1993. He competed for the job knowing that the administration had the goal of rescinding the constitutional right of reproductive choice.

During the Reagan and Bush era, the Justice Department argued to restrict or overturn the fundamental right to choose eight times in seven Supreme Court cases. Mr. Roberts helped author the brief in Rust v. Sullivan, defending the now-repealed "gag rule" that prohibits family planning providers from informing women of all their options when confronting an unwanted pregnancy. Saying the Roberts brief argued "in passing" for the overturn of Roe, as the editorial did, suggests it is inconsequential to urge that constitutional rights be repealed. Would The Post make the same argument about efforts to reverse Brown v. Board of Education?

In Bray v. Alexandria Women's Health Clinic, Mr. Roberts, on behalf of the Bush Justice Department, intervened as a friend of the court. The government's friendship was extended to Operation Rescue, which was terrorizing women who were trying to enter reproductive health facilities. Mr. Roberts argued that the nation's civil rights laws should be narrowly interpreted to preclude relief for women seeking constitutionally protected health services. Congress disagreed and the following year enacted the Freedom of Access to Clinic Entrances Act.

No one has an entitlement to a lifetime slot on the federal judiciary. The burden is on the nominee to demonstrate that he or she deserves Senate confirmation. This high threshold is essential to ensure that the judiciary will continue to guard our liberties against assault.

G.O.P. Reports an 'Impasse' Over Senate Reorganization
Alison Mitchell

Senior Senate Republicans said today that they had hit an impasse in talks with the new Democratic majority leader over organizing the Senate because of disputes about how to handle judicial nominees. They called for the issues in contention to be brought to the full Senate floor for a vote.

After two weeks of talks with Senator Tom Daschle of South Dakota, the new majority leader, the five Republican negotiators went public with their complaints this evening as the Senate was shutting down for the week.

"We are reluctantly here to announce we are at impasse at the moment," said Senator Mitch McConnell, Republican of Kentucky.

The Republican senators said they had reached agreement with the Democrats on essential details like the size and makeup of committees. But they said they wanted the resolution needed to organize the Senate under Democratic control to contain an assurance that all nominees for the Supreme Court would come before the full Senate for a vote.

They said they also wanted the resolution to require that if any senator exercised the right under Senate tradition to block a home-state judicial nominee, the action must be revealed to the public. Senator Phil Gramm, Republican of Texas, called such disclosure a "good government, sunshine provision."

The Republicans handed out a report showing that since at least the 1880's, the Judiciary Committee had sent to the floor even those Supreme Court nominations that were opposed by a committee majority.

Mr. Daschle said in a statement that he would continue to try to resolve the outstanding issues "through negotiations and discussions rather than potentially divisive votes. "He said he had "stated publicly and privately my commitment to assuring a fair process for judicial nominees."

But he has resisted setting down any formal procedure. One Democratic Senate aide said that a "subtle distinction but an important distinction" existed between a guarantee that the Judiciary Committee would send a Supreme Court nominee to the full Senate and an informal tradition of doing so. "It would be an unprecedented new grant of authority to the minority party," the aide said.

The issue of judicial candidates and the ideological direction of the federal courts is one of the most delicate areas of dispute between the parties. During the six years that the Republicans controlled the Senate and Bill Clinton was president, the Republicans offered neither of the guarantees to the Democrats that they are now seeking.

But they say they have been disturbed by vows by some Democrats to stop conservative judges. And they say they would be willing to make the two provisions they are seeking permanent no matter which party has control of the Senate.

Senator Patrick Leahy of Vermont, the new Judiciary chairman, issued a statement saying: "There is more than a little irony in the charge from some Republican quarters that the Democratic Senate will treat President Bush's judicial nominees unfairly. Some Republicans seem to be expecting in Democrats the same wiles that the G.O.P. Senate used in killing so many of President Clinton's nominees."

If the Senate held a vote on the two issues, the Republicans would probably not prevail. But the vote would put the Democrats in the politically embarrassing position of opposing public disclosure and looking like they were ready to block President Bush's Supreme Court picks.

When the Senate switched last week to Democratic control with Senator James M. Jeffords of Vermont becoming an independent, Mr. Daschle became majority leader and Democrats became committee chairmen. But many of the details of the changeover need to be approved by a vote.

Mr. Daschle hinted today that a long stalemate could be a problem for Mr. Bush. "What that means is action in the committees on virtually anything is unlikely," he said. "We wouldn't be able to do nominations or legislation because obviously you don't have the full complement of membership on those committees."

Bush's Judgeships Stall in the Senate

Dave Boyer

Senate Republican negotiators late yesterday declared an impasse in their talks with Democrats on President Bush´s judicial nominees and said it was time to move forward with an up-or-down vote on the new Senate organization.

"We are only asking for fairness," said Sen. Mitch McConnell, Kentucky Republican. The negotiators said the next move is up to Senate Majority Leader Tom Daschle, South Dakota Democrat, on whether to call a vote.

Republicans want the resolution to reflect the three points on which both parties agree, and the two contentious matters voted on independently as amendments to the resolution.

Republicans said the full Senate should have the opportunity to make a determination and that they would not filibuster if the resolution is voted down.

"We´re simply asking for there to be a vote. When we have fundamental differences, we vote," said Sen. Arlen Specter, Pennsylvania Republican. Both parties agree Democrats will have a one-seat majority on every committee, with the exception of the Ethics Committee, which by tradition is equally divided.

All committee members will retain their assignments, and committee funding and space agreements negotiated by the chairmen and ranking members will remain in effect. Democrats do not agree with Republicans that "blue slips," or single-senator veto slips on judges from home-state senators, should be eliminated.

Democratic leaders turned up the pressure yesterday on judgeships, accusing the GOP of holding up White House nominations by not submitting to the Democrats´ proposal to reorganize the Senate.

"They´re making my life easier," said Sen. Patrick J. Leahy, Vermont Democrat and chairman of the Senate Judiciary Committee. "For the life of me, I don´t know why they keep waiting. I´m ready to start (confirmation hearings) within 10 days to two weeks of the time that we reorganize."

Republicans say Mr. Leahy, one of the party's most liberal lawmakers, is a prime example of why they are pressing Mr. Daschle for assurances that Mr. Bush's nominees will be treated fairly. Mr. Leahy was one of the most outspoken critics of John Ashcroft's nomination for attorney general in a bruising confirmation hearing in January.

In two weeks of talks, Mr. Daschle has resisted Republican requests to promise floor votes on appeals court candidates and Supreme Court nominees if the Judiciary Committee rejects them. Mr. Daschle says he will hold up a deal to reorganize committees with Democratic majorities until both sides agree on the issue of nominations.

Democrats say Senate Republicans are only hurting their own administration by not accepting Democrats' more vague, nonbinding assurance to be fair to nominees. "Unfortunately, what that means is that action in the committees on virtually anything is unlikely," Mr. Daschle said yesterday.

"We wouldn't be able to do nominations or legislation. We're going to ... probably be faced with a bottled-up array of , but we won't be able to do that." Asked if he is "jamming" the White House's agenda, Mr. Daschle replied, "That's not my choice. I think it would be inexcusable for us to disenfranchise elected members of the Senate who were serving on these committees just a week ago, and now to tell them they can't vote. That isn't my jamming them, that is simply a reality; that's what senators are here to do, is to make decisions."

Referring to the new majority party's power to investigate the administration, Mr. Daschle added, "In the meantime, we'll be satisfied, I suppose, with the opportunities to hold oversight hearings and other kinds of hearings. ..." For example, Sen. Joseph I. Lieberman, Connecticut Democrat, has used his new chairmanship of the Governmental Affairs Committee to hold a hearing on the administration's refusal to set energy price caps in California. Mr. Lieberman, who lost his bid for the vice presidency last year and is considered a likely presidential candidate for 2004, also plans to hold hearings on Mr. Bush's environmental policies.

Reception President Bush's Federal Judge Nominees Face From The Democratic-Controlled Senate

Bob Edwards, Anchor; Nina Totenburg, Reporting

This is MORNING EDITION from NPR News. I'm Bob Edwards.

For six years, Democrats fumed when President Clinton's judicial nominees were stalled

by the Republican-controlled Senate. But the tables have been turned. Now there's a Republican president and a Democratic Senate. NPR legal affairs correspondent Nina Totenberg reports on what this could mean for President Bush's nominees.

NINA TOTENBERG reporting:

About 1/8th of the federal judiciary is vacant. But while 70 of the 102 vacancies are in the trial courts, President Bush has made just two nominations to fill those slots. Instead, the administration is concentrating on filling the 32 appeals court vacancies. The president has already sent the Senate names for half of those slots. There's a reason for that. The appeals courts are just one step below the Supreme Court, and these are the judges that are the final word in most of the cases heard across the country. Moreover, they are widely considered training grounds for the Supreme Court.

Indeed, it was the Clinton nominees for the appellate courts who were most ferociously stalled by the GOP in years gone by. The numbers tell the tale. Although Presidents Clinton and Reagan won confirmation for roughly equal numbers of judges in their two terms, Mr. Reagan won confirmation of 87 percent of his appeals court nominees, while Mr. Clinton won confirmation of only 61 percent, leaving the rest dangling without action.

In the last two years of the Clinton presidency, 17 appeals court nominees never got a hearing. Those who were confirmed waited, on average, more than a year. Contrast that with the wait for President Reagan's nominees in his last two years when the Democrats controlled the Senate, 17 weeks, and for the first President Bush's nominees, 15 weeks. The result is that now, after eight years of a Democratic administration, Republican appointees still dominate the influential appeals courts. President Bush wants to add to that advantage, and as Democrats see it, he has front-loaded the nomination process, concentrating his early judicial nominations in the appeals court. Senator Patrick Leahy, the Democratic chairman of the Senate Judiciary Committee, having served with six presidents, has this perspective.

Senator PATRICK LEAHY (Chairman, Senate Judiciary Committee): Presidents serve for no more than eight years; judges serve for a lifetime. And I think the Senate has a real responsibility to make sure that we have an independent judiciary, one that doesn't lurch to the right or the left.

TOTENBERG: And Leahy insists he will be fair.

Sen. LEAHY: I've talked with a number of Republican senators, and some have told me very frankly they were totally unfair to President Clinton and they're wondering if I'm going to do the same thing to them. I'm not. I'm not going to go for some kind of a payback.

TOTENBERG: Not surprisingly, the Republicans aren't taking those assurances at face value. A new group has sprung up, billing itself as bipartisan, and it's running ads, so far in just one state, South Dakota, which just happens to be the home of the Democratic Senate majority leader, Tom Daschle.

(Soundbite of advertisement)

Unidentified Woman: Our legal system affects us all. Every day courts make decisions that impact our families. That's why President Bush supports commonsense judges with character, experience and intellect.

TOTENBERG: Oklahoma Governor Frank Keating, a Republican, is chairman of the sponsoring group, Citizens for Common Sense Courts.

Governor FRANK KEATING (Republican, Oklahoma): The judiciary shouldn't be an arm of either party. Let's fairly get judges considered and confirmed.

TOTENBERG: But while Keating's group bills itself as bipartisan, the Democratic featured most prominently in its literature, former Democratic Attorney General Griffin Bell, says he is, in fact, not part of the group, that he declined to join, and yesterday the group retracted his name. That's not to say that Republican fears are unfounded. Liberal groups are already lining up to oppose a significant number of President Bush's judicial nominees. Nan Aron is director of the Alliance for Justice, an umbrella group of civil rights, environmental and consumer organizations.

Ms. NAN ARON (Alliance for Justice): We have grave doubts about most of the candidates nominated by President Bush. They were chosen by this president specifically because, while they may be very qualified and have excellent records on the law, they have shown by their actions or writings a real hostility to the gains made by women, minorities, and hostility to the role that government plays in improving the lives of Americans.

TOTENBERG: And specific groups have targeted specific nominees. Americans United for Separation of Church and State is opposing University of Utah Professor Michael McConnell, a respective conservative scholar who's long argued for greater accommodation between church and state. Also opposed to McConnell is the National Abortion Rights Action League, which cites his strong opposition to Roe vs. Wade. In addition, NARAL is also fighting the appeals court nomination of John Roberts, who, when he served as deputy solicitor general in the first Bush administration, wrote a brief that argued against federally funded clinics allowing doctors to discuss abortion with their patients. In that brief, Roberts contended that Roe vs. Wade should be reversed, a position he was quizzed about by Justice Harry Blackmun in a later case that he argued involving abortion clinics.

(Soundbite of interview)

Justice HARRY BLACKMUN: Mr. Roberts, in this case, are you asking that Roe vs. Wade by overruled?

Mr. JOHN ROBERTS: No, Your Honor. The issue doesn't even come up.

Justice BLACKMUN: Well, that hasn't prevented the solicitor general from taking that position

in prior cases.

TOTENBERG: But Walter Dellinger, who served as solicitor general in the Clinton administration, says it's very risky to judge judicial nominees by the positions they've taken as government lawyers.

Mr. WALTER DELLINGER (Former Solicitor General, Clinton Administration): The kind of arguments that John Roberts was making in the position of deputy solicitor general were the kind that a professional lawyer's expected to make when his client, the chief executive of which is the president of the United States, has run on those positions. I'm afraid that this is a process that will lead to the rejection of the most qualified of the nominees; that is, those who, like Roberts, have been out and have had a major lifetime of accomplishment.

TOTENBERG: Elizabeth Cavendish, the legal director of NARAL, disagrees.

Ms. ELIZABETH CAVENDISH (Legal Director, NARAL): He was aligned personally with these decisions. Again, he was a political appointee, and this was a signature position of the first Bush administration.

TOTENBERG: There's an irony in NARAL's position. Liberal groups were outraged when conservatives opposed some Clinton appointees because of positions they took as lawyers. I pressed the point on Cavendish. So you would say that those who are anti-abortion would be completely correct in voting their ideas and proposing pro-choice nominees.

Ms. CAVENDISH: It doesn't work both ways. The other side wants to turn back the clock on women's rights and roll back a fundamental right.

TOTENBERG: Just what will happen to the Roberts and McConnell nominations and others is unclear. When the Republicans controlled the Senate, those nominees had been slated for quick hearings. With the Democrats in control now, though, the first hearing is likely to be for Roger Gregory, an African-American from Virginia appointed by President Clinton to sit on an interim basis for a year on the 4th Circuit Court of Appeals. President Bush reappointed Gregory. Chairman Leahy says he intends to begin confirmation hearings in less than two weeks, but by tradition only one appeals court nominee is considered at a time, and historically there's an average of about one confirmation hearing a month.

With only three months left scheduled in this legislative session this year, that would mean three or four appeals court nominees possibly confirmed this year. Even that could be in doubt. North Carolina Republican Senator Jesse Helms blocked all of President Clinton's North Carolina nominees to the 4th Circuit, and nobody's quite sure what he will do about the Gregory nomination when it gets to the Senate floor, where he could put a so-called hold on it and send it into limbo.

Moreover, all confirmation hearings are on hold for the moment, because the Senate Democrats and Republicans have not agreed to a reorganizing plan in the aftermath of the Democratic takeover. The Republicans are seeking something that no Senate minority has ever had before: a guarantee that all the president's nominees will get a floor vote. Few observers believe the Republicans will get such an unprecedented guarantee, because the current stalemate is perfectly acceptable to the Democrats. If the Senate organization agreement is not forthcoming, it means simply that no nominations will move at all. Nina Totenberg, NPR News, Washington.

Republicans Seeking to Secure Votes on Judicial Nominees

Jesse J. Holland

Republicans backed down on Thursday from some of their demands for how the newly Democrat-controlled Senate should handle President Bush's nominees for the Supreme Court and federal judgeships.

Earlier in the week, GOP negotiators demanded guaranteed Senate votes on all Supreme Court and federal appellate court nominees, and elimination of the secret veto process for some judicial nominations.

After Democrats refused, Republicans sought to allow the full Senate - instead of negotiators - to decide whether the Supreme Court nominees should be guaranteed a vote. They also want the Senate to decide whether to make the senatorial veto process public instead of private, as it has been in the past.

Democrats say they will treat Bush's nominees fairly. Republicans fear Democrats will block Bush's judicial nominations.

"We're not asking for there to be a commitment," said Sen. Arlen Specter, R-Pa., one of the five GOP senators who have been negotiating with Majority Leader Thomas Daschle, D-S.D. "We're asking for there to be a vote."

Daschle, who is trying to reorganize the Senate to reflect the Democratic takeover, is opposed.

"I remain committed to trying to resolve the outstanding issues around the organization of the Senate through negotiations and discussions, rather than with potentially divisive votes," Daschle said.

Democratic aides said the idea of making public the secret vetoes likely would come up a meeting Tuesday of Democratic senators.

The maneuvering is the result of Vermont Sen. Jim Jeffords' decision to leave the GOP and become an independent, altering the 50-50 split in the Senate. Republicans had control by virtue of Vice President Dick Cheney's tie-breaking vote.

The two sides agreed that Democrats will gain a one-seat majority on each Senate committee, and the size of committees will be expanded to accommodate the one-seat Democratic edge. All Republicans will keep their committee assignments, and committee funding and space agreements negotiated at the beginning of the year will stay in effect as well.

Sen. Orrin Hatch of Utah, the top Republican on the Judiciary Committee, said that while filibustering the reorganization had not been discussed, GOP senators told negotiators to "go to the wall" over the judges provision.

Daschle said that if Republicans and Democrats are unable to agree on a reorganization, "action in the committees on virtually anything is unlikely."

The Case for Borking

Randall Kennedy

As the battle over the federal judiciary heats up, progressives must convince the general public of a basic proposition: The judiciary is an inescapably political branch of government whose agents, the judges, should be viewed in much the same way other politicians are.

To say that the courts are political may seem so obvious as to be banal. There is, however, a deep and widespread impulse to deny the political character of the courts. An important manifestation of this denial arises in the context of selecting, confirming, or rejecting candidates for the federal bench.

Many people bemoan, for example, what they term the "politicization" of the judiciary (as if there existed a golden age when judicial selection and judicial decision making were uncontaminated by politics). Liberals and conservatives, Democrats and Republicans have taken turns accusing each other of indulging in this unpardonable sin.

Progressives, however, should get off that unproductive rhetorical merry-go-round, accept the ineradicable presence of politics in the judicial arena, and strive to shape the judiciary in such a way that it will produce good, sound, progressive rulings. That will entail, among other things, lobbying on behalf of jurists who will advance the progressive agenda and against those who will be hostile to it.

Article II of the U.S. Constitution empowers the president exclusively to nominate federal judges, while it imposes a check on presidential authority by making the seating of a nominee dependent on the Senate's "Advice and Consent." Whereas the president is armed with veto power over legislation, the Senate, in effect, has veto power over judicial nominations.

Over the course of the nation's history, the Senate has exercised that power over Supreme Court nominees 29 times (and over district and appeals court nominees many times more). In addition to objecting to nominees on grounds of incompetence, dishonesty, or some other personal failing, senators have also voted nay for political or ideological reasons.

Opponents blocked George Washington's Supreme Court nominee Judge John Rutledge because of Rutledge's opposition to the Jay Treaty (despite the fact that the Senate had already confirmed him for a previous opening on the Court and that he had just served for an entire Supreme Court term as the interim chief justice).

Ulysses S. Grant's nominee Attorney General Ebeneezer Rockwood Hoar was not confirmed because he had opposed President Andrew Johnson's impeachment.

Herbert Hoover's nominee Judge John Parker was blocked because of Parker's perceived hostility to organized labor and the advancement of African Americans. And Ronald Reagan's nominee Judge Robert Bork didn't make it because opponents feared, among other things, that he would energetically attack abortion rights.

In principle there is nothing wrong with political blocking, even if doing so stems entirely from one particular issue. Would we now condemn a senator who, prior to the Civil War, voted against a nominee solely on the grounds that the candidate favored slavery? I would hope not.

Yet many people sneer at the notion of litmus tests for purposes of judicial selection or confirmation--even as they unknowingly conduct such tests themselves.

Litmus tests of all sorts are scattered about the judicial-selection process. When senators ask a nominee whether he or she believes that the proper role of a judge is to interpret rather than make law, or whether the Eighth Amendment should be deemed to prohibit capital punishment--all the while silently insisting upon an expected formulaic reply--they are imposing a litmus test.

Today, a candidate would not be nominated, much less confirmed, if he or she failed to genuflect convincingly to Marbury v. Madison (which established the authority of the Supreme Court to invalidate an act of Congress deemed to be in conflict with the Constitution), Brown v. Board of Education (which invalidated de jure racial segregation in public primary and secondary schools), or other once-controversial decisions that have become so thoroughly a part of the conventional wisdom that we no longer even perceive reactions to them as litmus tests of acceptability.

Since senators (and the public as a whole) should feel free to object to a nominee on political grounds, they should also feel free to demand that nominees truthfully divulge thinking that bears upon relevant judicial matters. Nominees--both liberals and conservatives--often claim that they cannot answer certain questions because to do so would be to prejudge a matter that may come before them.

But that response is typically a mere dodge to avoid controversy. Senators need not accept this.

If a
candidate refuses to answer relevant questions, senators should take that refusal into consideration when determining whether to vote to confirm. It makes no sense to offer lifetime tenure and all the power of judicial review to candidates whose thinking about crucial matters is unknown.

A transparent process in which ideological objections to judicial candidates are candidly voiced is a much-needed antidote to the murky "politics of personal destruction. "When politicians (again, both liberal and conservative) feel disabled from objecting to candidates on ideological grounds, they search high and low for pretexts on which to object: "He made this lewd statement to a colleague a decade ago," or "She committed this technical infraction of law."

Senators should not feel that they have to reveal or attack some personal blemish in order to justify a vote against a nominee. A deep, urgent, political disagreement is sufficient. It should be possible for a senator to acknowledge that a nominee is honorable, competent, and kind while still voting against confirmation because of the way the candidate would likely act as a judge. Nothing personal. Just politics.

Halting the Judgernaut

Alexander Wohl

As Capitol Hill adjusts to Vermont Senator Jim Jeffords's earthshaking repudiation of the Republican Party, the Senate Judiciary Committee is bracing itself to be the center of the aftershocks. The judicial branch of government, after all, is where a president is likely to have his most far-reaching impact; the judges he appoints will last much longer than the one or two terms he serves. And the Judiciary Committee--which is a key venue for debate about potent legislative issues such as abortion, school prayer, flag burning, and civil rights--is also the primary battleground in judicial-confirmation fights. Thus, with George W. Bush's first slate of nominees for the federal bench waiting for hearings, the most resounding political clashes of the summer are likely to occur on the Judiciary Committee's turf.

When Jeffords abandoned the Republicans, he threw control of Senate committees to the Democratic Party, providing Dems on the Judiciary Committee with the power to strangulate nominations in committee. (Actually, as of this writing, Republicans--aware of how defiantly they refused to allow many of Bill Clinton's nominations to get beyond the Judiciary Committee, and afraid of payback--are trying to force the Democrats to permit a full Senate vote for every judiciary nominee. A politically foolish position that will likely come to a quick resolution, this could bring all Senate business to a halt.) Given a free hand to nominate and confirm judges, Bush and the Senate Republicans would no doubt populate the federal bench with an army of Antonin Scalia clones--a legion of judges who, though perhaps ethnically diverse, share the extreme views of the Court's most conservative jurist. Indeed, the first batch of nominees the president sent to the Senate for confirmation has already made this clear. One logical response to such nominees would seem to be simply to block their consideration--especially since that was the Republican response to Clinton nominees whom the GOP considered to be too liberal.

But early signs indicate that the newly Democrat-controlled Judiciary Committee, along with the Senate as a whole, is taking a less direct and more wide-ranging approach, one that makes use of several different strategies at once while trying to minimize the danger of a public backlash. This highlights an important question , Is it worth letting all but the most conservative judges onto the federal bench--where they will preside for lifetime appointments, potentially lending important appeals courts a conservative coloration for up to 30 or 40 years--in order not to appear "obstructionist"? For some Democrats concerned with winning re-election, the answer may be yes. Still, if they're smart and stick together, the Democrats on the Judiciary Committee may be able to ensure that only the more moderate of Bush's nominees come to a full Senate vote--and to demonstrate the wisdom of their case to the American public.

"Don't Mess with Vermont"

How successful the Democrats are in preventing the confirmation of conservative judges will depend heavily on the committee's new chairman. A soft-spoken, liberal Vermonter, Patrick Leahy is a 27-year Senate veteran who has distinguished himself from many of his colleagues with his integrity and lack of ego. Smart and unafraid to play political hardball when necessary, he is adept at diffusing tension with gentle humor. (The day after the Jeffords switch, for example, "Don't Mess with Vermont" bumper stickers--attributed to Leahy--appeared around Washington, D.C.)

Leahy replaces Utah Senator Orrin Hatch--a fierce conservative whose favorite topic in recent committee sessions has been his own evenhandedness--as the ranking majority member on the committee. (Transcripts of recent hearings reveal Hatch to be remarkably, repetitively taken with his own "fairness.") Though Hatch has worked with Democrats on occasion, he fights hard for conservative Republican nominees and has the battle scars from the Robert Bork and Clarence Thomas Supreme Court nominations to prove it.

Leahy and Hatch consider themselves close friends and generally work well together. During Hatch's quixotic presidential run through early 2000, Leahy offered "to speak for him or against him, whichever would help more." But beneath this geniality, both sides are girding for war. Within days of Jeffords's announcement, Hatch was warning Democrats that "nobody's going to push me around." Leahy, for his part, has shown himself unafraid to take on the Republicans: He has challenged the GOP's hypocritical statements about the "quick pace" of Clinton nominations during Republican control of the committee and engineered a walkout from a hearing in which he felt the Republicans were trying to strong-arm Democrats into approving Bush nominees.

But for the first time in seven years, the Democrats have the numbers--if not literally (at this writing, the Senate leadership is negotiating whether the party balance on the committee will remain evenly split or a Democrat will be added to give the Dems a one-person advantage), then at least in terms of power. Majority status gives Leahy the gavel--and with it, the power to schedule and time hearings. Democrats now control the process: They decide when (and even if) nominees are brought up, how zealously they are interrogated, and how quickly they get voted on. And Senate Democratic aides say that Leahy is ready to take a much tougher line than others have in the past.

The recent debate over Ted Olson's nomination as solicitor general suggests how potent the Democrats' new majority status on the committee can be, if only they can muster the courage to exercise it. Erstwhile Senate Majority Leader Trent Lott was forced to discharge Olson's nomination from the Judiciary Committee (he did this under the bargain struck relating to the 50–50 Senate divide) the day Jeffords announced his switch: Lott knew that if he waited, the Democrats could use their new power in the Judiciary Committee to withhold the nomination from the floor. Moreover, after seeing Olson get voted in by the Senate--albeit by a razor-thin majority--Democrats surely understand that stopping someone is easier in committee than on the Senate floor, where there is the danger that some conservative Democrats will join the Republicans in crucial votes, as Georgia's Zell Miller and Nebraska's Ben Nelson did on Olson.

But now that the Democrats possess the power in the Judiciary Committee, will they be willing to use it? After failing to block Attorney General John Ashcroft and Solicitor General Olson, some Democrats said, in effect, "Well, we got enough votes to demonstrate that we could block a nomination--but we didn't do it because these were only cabinet appointments, not Supreme Court justices, which are lifetime appointments." Fair enough. But lower-court federal judges get appointed for life, too. Do the Democrats have the will to scrutinize and oppose district and circuit court candidates?

Whom to Oppose?

Democrats are still strategizing about whom they should oppose. This requires a calculated analysis not just of the nominees' records and the courts for which the judges have been nominated, but of public opinion. Democrats have seen how the perception of obstructionism or intransigence has sometimes hurt the Republicans--most notably after the government shutdown in 1995, during Clinton's impeachment in 1998, and last month when the GOP lost Jeffords--and don't want to be perceived that way themselves.

Both Leahy and the new majority leader, South Dakota's Tom Daschle, have said that they will work to prevent an ideological court packing and that they want "good, moderate, middle-of- the-road, credible" nominees. But already a number of Bush's nominees fall outside that description. This is particularly significant right now, because--after years of Republicans stonewalling Bill

Clinton's nominees--there are many vacancies, including 31 openings on federal appeals courts. Several circuit courts of appeal are very closely divided between liberals and conservatives. (The tiny First Circuit, for example, whose six judges cover Maine, Massachusetts, New Hampshire, Rhode Island, and Puerto Rico, has one opening and leans barely Republican; and the Third Circuit, which includes Delaware, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, and the Virgin Islands, is evenly divided and has two vacancies.) Just a few Bush appointees could tilt the judicial balance of the country in a decidedly conservative direction for a long time to come.

So Democrats considering circuit court nominees need to examine not just whether the prospective lifetime appointee has views so extreme as to be out of the mainstream, but whether adding that person to a court will change the ideological complexion of a particular circuit.

Given these parameters, there are several clear targets among the first group of Bush nominees. For instance, two Fourth Circuit nominees cry out for opposition. Terrence Boyle, chief judge of the U.S. District Court of the Eastern District of North Carolina, is a former aide to Senator Jesse Helms and, not surprisingly, is extremely conservative. He was already denied a spot on the court of appeals in 1991, when he was nominated by President George H.W. Bush, but the Senate did not act on his nomination. Helms retaliated by blocking all of President Clinton's nominees to fill North Carolina's Fourth Circuit vacancies. (Helms's desire to get Boyle on the court is ironic given Helms's repeated statements over the past several years that "there is no need to put more judges on that court because to do so would make it less efficient.")

The other nominee to the Fourth Circuit, South Carolina District Judge Dennis Shedd, is equally conservative; he served as chief counsel and staff director under former Judiciary Committee Chairman Strom Thurmond, who is now a senior committee member. Although Shedd has already attracted much opposition from civil rights groups, it will require coordinated strength to block him, given the tradition of deference to nominees who once worked in the Senate, even if only in a staff capacity.

But the Fourth Circuit already tilts heavily to the right. In contrast, the Sixth Circuit (which covers Michigan, Ohio, Tennessee, and Kentucky) and the D.C. Circuit are closely divided. Thus, Miguel Estrada, nominated for the D.C. Circuit, and Jeffrey Sutton, nominated for the Sixth, are judicial conservatives whom Democrats could confidently and appropriately oppose.

After the Supreme Court, the D.C Circuit is generally seen as the most powerful court in the nation, because of its role in interpreting statutes and agency decisions and because it has historically served as a springboard for potential Supreme Court nominees. Adding Estrada--who was a law partner of Ted Olson and is known for sharing the judicial philosophy of Justices Scalia and Thomas--to that court, along with another Bush nominee, the conservative John Roberts, would significantly enhance a slight conservative majority on this key bench.

The Sixth Circuit is even more closely divided. A former state solicitor from Ohio, Sutton--who has argued a number of times in the Supreme Court for expanded state power and for voiding congressional initiatives--has already been the focus of opposition. But another Sixth Circuit nominee, Ohio Supreme Court Justice Deborah Cook, also deserves a close look. In one representative decision, she denied a blind woman's request to be admitted to medical school because of the undue burden it would have placed on the school.

The 10th Circuit (which covers Colorado, Kansas, New Mexico, Oklahoma, Utah, & Wyoming) also is narrowly divided. The nomination to this court of Michael McConnell, a Federalist Society conservative and a professor at the University of Utah, has already generated opposition because of his extremist interpretation of the religion clauses of the First Amendment and their potential application to a variety of social issues ranging from school vouchers to gay rights.

Democrats can prevent Bush's nominees from being confirmed in several ways. First, of course, is to vote them down, either in committee or on the floor. Second is to delay their confirmation hearings indefinitely, as the Republicans did for so many Clinton nominees. (A variation on this option is to use control of the process to lengthen investigative hearings when that would be effective.) Expect Leahy to make use of both tactics. But more important is a third approach, which is to avoid nasty committee fights and use the potential power of a unified Democratic majority--for now, the committee will follow the caucus party line and vote up or down together--to influence the White House not to nominate right-wingers in the first place. It is therefore incumbent on the Bush White House, which until now has given only lip service to the idea of consultation with the Senate, to work with Leahy and the Democrats if it wants its nominees to be confirmed in a timely fashion.

Finally, several changes in procedure will slow down the process while adding an opportunity for more information and fairness. Leahy has already promised to reinstate the use of evaluations by the American Bar Association before any hearings. (This nonpartisan analysis of candidates, which every president since Dwight D. Eisenhower has used in considering nominees, was eliminated by George W. Bush.) Leahy is also likely to hold quick hearings for less controversial nominees and for nominees who are designated for courts with the greatest need before turning to the possible challenges. In this way, he can accumulate public support that he can later use in opposing the more conservative or controversial nominees. And he will probably not hold hearings for more than one nominee at a time--something that makes abundant sense but that the Republicans failed to do.

The prevailing view has been that nominees are presumed to be confirmable, unless senators or interest groups find something "wrong" with them. Some legal scholars have proposed the idea of requiring nominees to demonstrate why they should be confirmed, and there are signs that Leahy is open to this approach.

The Senate has an important role to play in evaluating and challenging individuals who are being appointed to a lifetime job of interpreting the Constitution. While Republicans are likely to cry "Bork!" whenever a nominee is criticized (even though the same Democratically controlled Congress that rejected Bork overwhelmingly confirmed Scalia), Democrats should not shy away from opposing any (and even many) of President Bush's nominees. Nor should they be tempted to give free passes to minority candidates if those candidates are too conservative. The Constitution says that the Senate will give its advice and consent on all nominations. Most Americans don't want a judiciary slanted sharply in either direction. We will soon see whether the new majority in the Senate has the guts and the ability to make a credible case to the American people that President Bush should not have the unilateral authority to shape the judicial branch in his conservative image.

At High Court, a Retirement Watch

Rehnquist, O'Connor Top List of Possibilities as Speculation on Replacement Grows
Charles Lane and Amy Goldstein

As the Supreme Court prepares to end its term this month, the White House, the Senate and interest groups across the ideological spectrum are preparing for the possibility that a member of the court might retire, with Chief Justice William H. Rehnquist's departure the most frequently mentioned scenario.

There is no direct evidence that Rehnquist, 76, or any other member of the court is planning to step down this year. Justice Sandra Day O'Connor, 71, recently dampened speculation about her departure, making an unusual announcement that she had "no plans" to leave. When Rehnquist was asked through the Supreme Court press office for a similar statement, he declined to comment.

Now that a Republican occupies the White House for the first time in eight years, however, court observers consider it more likely that Rehnquist or O'Connor, who were both longtime activists in Arizona Republican politics before being appointed to the court by Republican presidents, will step down sometime in the next few years.

"Make no mistake," said one longtime friend of the chief justice, Rehnquist would prefer to "return" his seat to a Republican president. But another justice recently told a friend there was no suggestion around the court that a departure is imminent.

Similarly, a lawyer who has regular contact with the White House counsel's office said, "I don't see the kind of frenzied activity by people who would be involved" in the administration if they knew a retirement were looming. In the past, many justices have directly or indirectly relayed their departure plans to the White House slightly before announcing them publicly, often at the end of the term.

Nonetheless, the thought of stepping down apparently has at least crossed Rehnquist's mind. When PBS interviewer Charlie Rose asked in February if he could imagine retiring, Rehnquist replied, "Sure."
Justice John Paul Stevens, 81, is older than Rehnquist and O'Connor, and he also was appointed by a Republican president, Gerald R. Ford, in 1975. But Stevens is not considered a likely candidate for retirement. He remains in vigorous health -- and, though still nominally a

Republican, has moved to the left in his years on the court. He dissented vigorously from last year's court decision, spearheaded by its most conservative members, to stop the Florida recount and effectively ensure Bush's victory.

There have been no changes in membership at the Supreme Court since Stephen G. Breyer replaced Harry Blackmun in the fall of 1994, creating the second-longest period of stability in the court's history and pent-up anxiety about when the next vacancy will occur.

In such an uncertain climate, the administration, Congress and advocacy groups are keenly sensitive to the opportunity President Bush will have to shape the court -- one of the presidency's most enduring powers. The White House and the Justice Department have been working for months to define the factors that would go into choosing a nominee, as well as beginning to sift through potential candidates.

"We are working hard to be prepared," said White House Counsel Alberto R. Gonzales, who oversees the selection process and is himself a potential choice. "Even during the transition we began thinking about possible nominees to the court."

On Capitol Hill, Republicans on the Senate Judiciary Committee have already begun "informal discussions and talks" about potential candidates, said Makan Delrahim, the committee's GOP staff director.

In the meantime, conservative and liberal advocacy groups have been working aggressively to try to influence the president's eventual choice -- and public opinion. Conservatives have been urging Bush not to back down from his campaign statements that the current justices he most admires are Antonin Scalia and Clarence Thomas, the members furthest to the right.

"We are looking to him to stay as close to that standard and as consistently close to that standard as he can," said Thomas L. Jipping, director of the judicial selection monitoring project of the Free Congress Foundation.

On the left, civil rights groups and women's organizations have been trying to stoke public fears that Bush's impact on the court could have dire consequences on issues ranging from abortion to education to affirmative action.

"If George W. Bush follows through on his promise to the right wing and nominates someone in the mode of Scalia and Thomas and Rehnquist, then there is going to be an epic battle," said Ralph Neas, president of People for the American Way.

The ideological skirmish that has broken out in Congress during the last month over Bush's initial nominees to lower federal courts is widely considered a prelude to the full-scale battle that a Supreme Court opening could create.

According to aides in the administration and on Capitol Hill, the cross pressures on the president in making his selection will be intense. On the one hand, the shift of the Senate this month to

Democratic control, analysts say, could hinder Bush's prospects for securing a replacement as conservative as Rehnquist. At the same time, the GOP's right wing is insistent that the president must not reduce conservative strength on the court by nominating anyone more liberal than Rehnquist.

"The difficulty is that the president has got to decide, 'How much political capital am I willing to bleed for a controversial Supreme Court nominee?' " said a conservative legal expert.

In such a contentious environment, names that have been considered among Judiciary Committee Republicans, sources said, include federal appeals court judges Emilio Garza, Edith H. Jones and J. Michael Luttig and the committee's ranking Republican, Sen. Orrin G. Hatch (Utah).

Other possibilities the president might favor, a variety of sources say, include conservative appeals court judges J. Harvie Wilkinson and Frank H. Easterbrook and Washington lawyers John G. Roberts and Miguel Estrada, both nominated by Bush last month to the federal appeals court here.

Bush also could look to members of Congress, such as Sen. Jon Kyl (R-Ariz.) or Rep. Christopher Cox (R-Calif.), who was being considered by the White House this spring for an appeals court seat but withdrew from consideration because of opposition from California's Democratic senators.

Administration officials declined to confirm any candidates they are contemplating. Bush has indicated he would like to nominate the first Hispanic justice, a move that might help him woo Latino voters in 2004 and improve his chances of winning confirmation in the Senate. In that context, Gonzales, a former justice on the Texas Supreme Court and a confidant of Bush's, is considered a prime candidate.

Asked whether he might accept a nomination, Gonzales said: "I am asked this question a lot. I typically say I don't intend to be a candidate. . . . My focus is working here, serving this president in this capacity."

Some conservatives consider Gonzales too moderate, and others view him as lacking the experience to become chief justice. To allay such concerns, Bush could make a double switch, nominating a current member of the court -- perhaps O'Connor --to replace the chief justice and naming Gonzales an associate justice.

"Politically, nothing beats that pair," said a lawyer who knows several of the justices personally.

Rehnquist's departure would not be as politically momentous as that of O'Connor, who is a swing vote on the closely divided court. Rehnquist is a consistent conservative, so the prospect of an equally conservative Bush-nominated successor for him would merely reinforce the existing ideological mix.

"If O'Connor is stepping down, then there will be all these arguments . . . about the balance of the court," said Terry Eastland, publisher of the conservative Weekly Standard and a senior Justice Department official in the Reagan administration. "With Rehnquist, the Democrats might be more willing to defer to the president in terms of judicial philosophy."

By regaining control of the Senate, the Democrats now run the Judiciary Committee, which will largely determine how quickly a nomination is processed -- and how much the nominee is grilled about his or her judicial philosophy.

Some Senate Democrats have begun discussing whether they would even employ a filibuster or other procedural tactics to block a Bush appointee from being voted on by the full Senate -- a sharp departure from past practice. In 1987, Robert H. Bork was allowed a vote on the Senate floor, even after the Democratic-controlled Judiciary Committee rejected him. Bork lost the floor vote, 58 to 42.

Rehnquist has been on the court since 1972, when he became an associate justice under President Richard M. Nixon. President Ronald Reagan elevated Rehnquist to chief justice in 1986, to replace the retiring Warren E. Burger.

In a recent interview with Fox News, Rehnquist said he had thought of departing before he was tapped to be chief justice. He acknowledged he has been having trouble lately remembering names and sent this wistful message to his television audience: "I'll tell them this, that I just think I've been extraordinarily fortunate in my life, and I'm very grateful for my good fortune."

Rehnquist's health, particularly severe back pain, has been a problem in the past. Although he still must rise from the bench and stretch his back during the court's two-hour oral argument sessions, he now appears to be in good physical and mental condition.

Under Rehnquist, a five-member conservative majority on the court has moved the law in a decidedly conservative direction, trimming affirmative action, clearing legal obstacles to the application of capital punishment, and limiting federal authority over the states.

Asked during the PBS interview if it would make a difference to him that there is a Republican in the White House, Rehnquist did not answer directly but did concede that there had "traditionally" been a "slight preference" by justices to retire during administrations of the party that appointed them.

Daschle's 'Intensive Care Unit' to Attend to Patients' Rights

POWER PLAY: The Senate has once again gone into overtime in trying to nail down the fine points of its shifting power balance, delaying approval of a new resolution on committee organization because of an unresolved dispute over the handling of judicial nominations.

Without an agreement, freshman senators are left without committee assignments, many Democratic committee chairmen have to operate with Republican majorities -- and President Bush will have to wait awhile longer for action on his nominees.

The reason is that the power-sharing agreement negotiated when the Senate was evenly divided lapsed when Democrats took control this month, meaning that committee organization reverts to what it was at the end of the 106th Congress -- until a new agreement is reached.

After two weeks of quiet, behind-the-scenes negotiations, Republicans went public last week with demands for a guarantee that Supreme Court nominees will come to the Senate floor for a vote and for public disclosure when nominees are blocked by their home-state senators under the "blue slip" process. They said they asked Majority Leader Daschle to put the two proposals to a vote by the Senate, and he refused.

Later, Daschle issued a statement saying he has made both public and private commitments to "assuring a fair process for judicial nominees" and wants to resolve remaining organizational issues "through negotiations and discussions, rather than with potentially divisive votes."

On a party-line vote, which is customary on votes related to party powers, the GOP proposals would be defeated 51-49. But Republicans could claim a moral high ground in favor of full disclosure and fair treatment for a new president's nominees.

Senate Majority Leader Tom Daschle on Judicial Nominations
Tony Snow, Juan Williams

WILLIAMS: Senator Daschle, since Mr. Jeffords has come over, at least for caucus purposes, with the Democrats, there's been no reorganization of the Senate. So I'm wondering, how are you operating? And what pressures are there on you, as the Senate majority leader, to in fact now reach some deal with the Republicans so that you can get back to business?

DASCHLE: Well, Juan, I've told my Republican colleagues that I'm not going to jam them, I'm going to give them time to sort this out. These transitions are never easy. It took Senator Lott and I a couple of months to work out power-sharing.

But this is nothing compared to what we had to work through with power-sharing. That was unprecedented. The circumstances now are certainly not unprecedented, and we went through a lot of the same types of questions in the 1950s. Ao this is really a matter of whether we have the one-vote majority in committees, whether or not we revert back to power-sharing if something would change, whether or not we can work (Publication page references are not available for this document.) out staff and budgets. I think we can, and I think we're getting closer.

WILLIAMS: Well, now, what about the pressure coming from the GOP to say, listen, we want some assurances, we want them written down, and, in specific, concern about judicial nominations and the fact that they not get bottled up in committee but be able to reach to the Senate floor for a full vote?

DASCHLE: Well, I have said over and over that we're going to be fair. We are determined not to engage in any payback. We're not going to do what we think in many cases was done to our nominees in the last eight years. That isn't what we're all about.

What we want to do is move forward, assure that there are votes. But we don't want to abrogate the constitutional process of advice and consent, to make sure, absolutely certain that the judiciary committee has the prerogative and has the responsibility that it's been charged to take on. And that's what this is about.

SNOW: But, Senator, the constitutional obligation is for the entire Senate, it's not the Senate Judiciary Committee. And the founders never said, well, we want the Judicial Committee to decide who gets to serve as judges.

What have you told Republicans, other than that you'd be fair? Specifically, what have you promised them?

DASCHLE: Well, what I've promised them, Tony, is that we were going to assure them that every nominee, regardless of whether it's judiciary or executive, will have a fair hearing, will have an opportunity to be considered, and I can't go any further than that.

Obviously, we don't want to see happen what happened over the last five years, where some judges were kept without even the opportunity to be heard for over four years; where some senators, because you had secret holds, were given no opportunity to have the right to be considered and to be voted on. We're not going to do that. I don't think we should do that.

But I'm not going to engage or commit to an extralegal process that says, in some cases, regardless of what the Judiciary Committee does, we're going to bypass the committee and go straight to the floor.

SNOW: Why not? That's the agreement you just had.

REV_00127735

DASCHLE: No, no, I don't think we've ever had an agreement of that kind.

SNOW: Did you not have an agreement that, when you had the 50-50 power-sharing agreement, that nominations would go to the Senate floor?

DASCHLE: No, what we had was an agreement that either the majority or the minority leader could make a motion to proceed to a nomination. And I obviously would be willing to look at something like that. But never did we have an automatic commitment that any nominee or any bill would come straight to the floor.

Senator Joe Biden on Judicial Nominations

Tim Russert

MR. RUSSERT: You're also a member of the Senate Judiciary Committee.

SEN. BIDEN: I am.

MR. RUSSERT: Harry Reid, Democratic senator from Nevada and a colleague of yours, said the other day, talking about the Supreme Court: "We may wind up with another Scalia. Even though I disagree with the result of some of his opinions, his ability to reason is about as good as I've ever seen. I'm not looking for another Antonin Scalia, but I think that he brings with him such an intriguing background and such a brilliant ability to reason, that if we had someone like him, it would be a tougher decision for the Senate."

SEN. BIDEN: Wouldn't be tough for me at all. I've spoken to Justice Scalia. I consider us good acquaintances. So we kid each other occasionally when he--like, for example, I got a note or a call, I can't recall which, saying when the special prosecutor thing was--when we all voted against it, you know, reinstating, he called and says, "See, I was right the first time in the Morrison vs. Olson case."

I teach constitutional law--he called me and said, "I better come up and help you with those students. They're getting the wrong idea." As I've said to him, bluntly, I regret--the two most regrettable decisions I made were voting for him and voting for Reagan's tax cut.

MR. RUSSERT: Scalia was confirmed 98-to-nothing.

SEN. BIDEN: No--he was, but you--remember the context then? The context was we had a governor named Mario Cuomo saying he'd kick anybody's rear-end who didn't vote for the Italian. And, you know, remember he didn't answer any questions and no one forced him to answer any questions. Look, the fact that someone is brilliant does not qualify them to be on the Supreme Court. They can be brilliant and wrong. I would like--for example, I think it's important there is a Scalia on the court. I'd like another Brennan on the court, as well. But if you want someone who's brilliant in his reasoning, equally as consequential, I'd take Souter. He's equally as bright as Scalia. Writes better than...

MR. RUSSERT: As chief justice.

SEN. BIDEN: As chief justice.

MR. RUSSERT: You don't believe the Democrats would ever support Scalia to be chief justice of the Supreme Court?

SEN. BIDEN: I'm not speaking to the Democrats. I'm speaking for me. His view of the Constitution, that there are no unenumerated rights in the Constitution, that there's a very--this is the most activist Supreme Court we've had in the history of the United States of America, Tim. They have--they're the only court that has ever declared unconstitutional seven national pieces of legislation. People don't know. They declared, for example, the Older Americans Act unconstitutional as it applies to states.

MR. RUSSERT: But doesn't George Bush have a right to have conservatives on the Supreme Court?

SEN. BIDEN: Sure, he does. And I have a right to have who I want. This is what they call, you know, co-equal branches of government.

MR. RUSSERT: A liberal litmus test?

SEN. BIDEN: No, no. No, no, no. You're putting words in my mouth. You said, "Does he have a right to have conservatives?" To the degree that he pushes to the right, I can push to the center or to the left. The Constitution says that the United States Senate gets to determine--he gets to pick, his is to propose, ours is to dispose. We have from Rutledge back in the turn of the century with George Washington straight on through. We've rejected people whose views we believe are out of sync with what the Senate is.

I was asked advice by President Clinton when he had a chance to put people on the court. I went down to see him. I said, "Mr. President, when there's a divided government, you should pick someone in the middle. You should understand that." And he did. My advice to the president of the United States is if he wants a holy war, he can do that and pick another Scalia. But there's a divided government. The nation is divided on these issues. He should pick someone who is a centrist. He can be center right, but to pick someone on the extreme left or right would be a serious mistake, in my opinion.

Two Superior Judges Merit Confirmation

Jim Petro, Ohio State Auditor (Editorial)

During the 2000 presidential campaign, President Bush promised that he would nominate for federal judgeships only people of the highest integrity and professional competence and who possess the proper judicial temperament. Recently, Bush began delivering on that promise by nominating 11 men and women from across the country from both political parties for seats on the various federal courts of appeal.

Ohioans should be proud that for the first two of seven vacancies on the 6th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals, which covers Ohio, Michigan, Kentucky and Tennessee, the president nominated two outstanding Ohioans to serve on that bench: Ohio Supreme Court Justice Deborah L. Cook and former state solicitor Jeffrey S. Sutton.

As former assistant prosecutor, city law director in Rocky River and lawyer in private practice for the past 28 years, it has been my pleasure and privilege to have appeared before and practiced with thousands of judges and attorneys throughout the state. Without a doubt, Cook and Sutton are among the best-qualified lawyers to serve in the federal judiciary that I have seen in my legal career.

After a distinguished 13-year career in private practice in Akron, Cook joined the Ohio Court of Appeals in 1991, where she quickly developed an excellent reputation for her hard work and for the quality of her opinions. Elected and re-elected to the Ohio Supreme Court in 1994 and 2000, Cook has been praised by The Dispatch for her "keen intellect" and "careful legal scholarship."

The newspaper noted that she applies the law "without fear or favor" in crafting rulings that are governed by the Constitution and not by popularity polls or special interests.

Sutton graduated first in his class at Ohio State University Law School and served as a law clerk for two different U.S. Supreme Court justices, a rare honor. As Ohio's state solicitor, he was responsible for arguing cases of the utmost importance to Ohioans before both the Ohio and the U.S. Supreme Courts.

A prolific legal scholar, Sutton has written more than 50 law review articles and two legal texts. While keeping his private practice in Columbus, he also is teaching constitutional law at OSU law school.

When Bush submitted his nominees for the federal appeals courts to the U.S. Senate for confirmation, he called upon senators of both parties to restore civility and dignity to the confirmation process, and, most importantly, he asked for a prompt vote on each nominee.

Right now the court, based in Cincinnati, is critically short of judges to handle an ever-expanding caseload. Because of their impeccable credentials, Cook and Sutton should be swiftly confirmed.

Lack of News Makes Pontificating Difficult but Not Impossible

Joe Hallett, Dispatch Politics Editor

A big patch of white space, a fast-closing deadline and an empty head. Mid- June and the dog days are here already. Will loyal readers -- both of them -- notice if there is no column this week? Can't do commentary without some news. It's plain dead around here.

Speaking of death, maybe column grist could be ground from the pending U.S. Supreme Court case on whether mentally ill murderers should be executed. But what's the point now? We already killed schizophrenic Jay D. Scott.

The legal system, though, is always column fodder, and it would be timely to discuss President Bush's nomination of Columbus attorney Jeffrey Sutton to the 6th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals in Cincinnati.

But that has to do more with the political system, and editors are always griping that readers don't care about politics. Why waste a column on it? So what if the new Democratic majority in the U.S. Senate, for its own partisan aggrandizement, stands ready to ravage Sutton's reputation?

So what if the Democrats are salivating to tar Sutton unfairly as an uncompassionate conservative for having the audacity to argue successfully before the U.S. Supreme Court that the Constitution limits the ability of citizens to sue state governments for discrimination against the disabled?

Does anyone think for a moment that Senate Democrats will care that Sutton, at age 40, suffers from osteoarthritis, a degenerative disease that eventually would have put him in a wheelchair, if not for the miracle of hip- replacement surgery?

Will Senate Democrats give a hoot that Sutton, a brilliant attorney by virtually everyone's account, has a history of performing free legal work for social causes and groups? He has argued, pro bono, on behalf of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People, the Anti-Defamation League of B'nai B'rith, the Center for the Prevention of Handgun Violence and the American Civil Liberties Union.

Not long ago, Sutton took up the cause of a Chillicothe prison inmate and won a 9-0 decision from the U.S. Supreme Court, the ninth case in five years he had argued before the high court, probably more than any other private attorney.

Senate Democrats won't care. They're bent on getting back at Republicans for confirming only 61 percent of President Clinton's judicial nominees. When and if the Democrats give Sutton a hearing, they'll be more concerned about placating the constituencies who larder their coffers than putting a fair, honest person on the federal bench.

In a hearing process that too often has turned well-meaning nominees from both parties into bitter and spiteful judges -- Supreme Court Justice Clarence Thomas comes to mind --Sutton will be put through the political wringer, used and abused, to signal Bush that his Supreme Court nominees can expect even tougher treatment.

But, heck, nobody is interested in such political shenanigans except for maybe both readers of this column.

Well, then, there is the school-funding case. The Ohio Supreme Court will hear arguments Wednesday. For a third time, the court is expected to rule 4-3 that the legislature and governor failed to ensure an adequate and equitable education for Ohio's schoolchildren.

Lawyers for the state hope to turn one of two Republican justices, Paul E. Pfeifer or Andrew Douglas, who formed the majority with two Democrats in the previous decisions. A victory for the financially insatiable coalition of schools almost certainly will mean higher taxes.

The school-funding case has been around for 10 years. Yesterday's news is boring.

Oh, yeah, there's the Big Three Republican feud at the Statehouse. But that, too, is insider politics. Speaker Larry Householder of Glenford and Senate President Richard H. Finan of Cincinnati had their way with Gov. Bob Taft on the state budget and now they are poised to embarrass the governor by overriding some of his 49 vetoes.

Obviously, Taft's re-election in 2002 is not a high priority for Republicans controlling the General Assembly. For that matter, it appears not to be a high priority for Taft. While getting pushed around by legislative Republicans, he declined to use the bully pulpit to defend his own reasonable budget proposal, one that would not have gutted higher education.

Taft may have trouble telling voters what he stands for next year. But that's then and this is now, and there is nothing going on.

Unless, of course, anyone considers the latest scandal at the Ohio Department of Job and Family

REV_00127740

Services worthy of comment. News flash: Department illegally withholds more child-support payments from poor children. Routine stuff.

Maybe a column could be crafted around the big-money push at the Statehouse to permit video-gambling machines at Ohio's seven horse racetracks. But thanks to Taft, that's dead for the moment. Maybe something could be written about all the wacko legislation that right-wingers in the House want to pass. But why dignify wackiness?

My gosh, look at the time! All this white space to fill and nothing to write. Will somebody please make some news around here?

Heat Turned Up High in Judicial Kitchen

Russ Pulliam

He's been there, done that.

Federal Judge Daniel Manion recommends a thick skin and some experience in rough-and-tumble political battles for potentially controversial judicial nominees. President Bush already has submitted some nominations for federal court positions for U.S. Senate confirmation. But the big battle is yet to come with an anticipated opening on the U.S. Supreme Court in the next year or so.

When Manion was nominated by President Ronald Reagan for the 7th Circuit Court of Appeals in 1986, the mild-mannered former state senator from South Bend was surprised to become the center of controversy. The Manion battle was a warm-up for bigger ones over subsequent nominations of Robert Bork and Clarence Thomas for the Supreme Court.

Manion was blasted by People for the American Way and Senate Democrats for being unqualified for the court position. Sen. Edward Kennedy called him "the least-qualified" nominee he had ever seen for the federal appeals court. His critics found fault with his proof-reading because of errors in his correspondence.

Yet Manion also attracted endorsements from liberal Democrats who knew him back in Indiana. He made it to the bench after close votes in the Senate.

Manion understood that his critics weren't aiming the mud-slinging at him personally. What they really objected to was his willingness to look to the original intent of the Constitution. But he worries that mud-slinging campaigns that got worse under Bork and Thomas could deter qualified people from serving on the courts.

"I had a much thicker skin politically," he said in a recent interview. "I understood what was going on."

Good lawyers can make more money in private practice. "Why should I subject myself to this kind of attack?" he can hear potential candidates say. "I don't need to have my name dragged through the mud. Who knows what they'll come up with -- what kind of magazines you subscribe to. That's the kind of drivel it descends to," Manion added.

Critics might suggest that those who can't stand the heat should stay out of the judicial kitchen. But the judicial branch traditionally has been set above the partisan politics of the legislative and executive branches. Until the Bork-Thomas controversies, a long tradition was to evaluate court nominees on the basis of competence and personal character.

Manion has had the last word with the critics who attacked his alleged incompetence. "He made a liar out of them," commented a court colleague, William Bauer. "He is very bright, hard-working, thoughtful. Our job is to make sure we follow the Constitution. That's what he does very well."

Another Indiana lawyer, Peter Rusthoven, was associate counsel during the Reagan administration and gained an insider's perspective on the court nomination process. He suggests that more ideological battles over these nominations will undermine confidence in the courts as impartial decision-makers.

"Judicial nominations are no longer about, is this person smart, well-trained in the law, hard-working," he said. "Instead, you're nominating a person who is going to have one vote in a super-legislature, and that super-legislature is going to decide all kinds of things that the courts traditionally never decided."

With activist judges "writing" laws, the executive and legislative branches lose their chance to settle controversial political and social issues. Rusthoven is hoping for more strict constructionist judges who will be willing to defer issues back to the legislative branch when no clear constitutional issues are at stake.

He points to the 1857 Dred Scott decision as a notorious example of judicial activism, with the court taking over the slavery issue by ruling that blacks were not citizens. "It severely minimized the possibility of working out the slavery issue in the elected or political branches of government," he said. "It took away from the Congress the ability to regulate slavery in the territories."

The Senate ought to give Bush the green light to nominate strict-constructionist judges for the high court. A few more of them could help take the court out of some of the controversial political issues that are better left to the two elected branches of government.

Reason to Reject

Elizabeth Cavendish, Legal Director, NARAL

We take exception to the belief that it is unfair to challenge the qualifications of judicial nominee John G. Roberts Jr. based upon antiabortion briefs he filed as a government lawyer [editorial, June 7].

Mr. Roberts was a political appointee in the Reagan administration and served as principal deputy solicitor general for President Bush from 1989 to 1993. He competed for the job knowing that the administration had the goal of rescinding the constitutional right of reproductive choice.

During the Reagan and Bush era, the Justice Department argued to restrict or overturn the fundamental right to choose eight times in seven Supreme Court cases. Mr. Roberts helped author the brief in Rust v. Sullivan, defending the now-repealed "gag rule" that prohibits family planning providers from informing women of all their options when confronting an unwanted pregnancy. Saying the Roberts brief argued "in passing" for the overturn of Roe, as the editorial did, suggests it is inconsequential to urge that constitutional rights be repealed. Would The Post make the same argument about efforts to reverse Brown v. Board of Education?

In Bray v. Alexandria Women's Health Clinic, Mr. Roberts, on behalf of the Bush Justice Department, intervened as a friend of the court. The government's friendship was extended to Operation Rescue, which was terrorizing women who were trying to enter reproductive health facilities. Mr. Roberts argued that the nation's civil rights laws should be narrowly interpreted to preclude relief for women seeking constitutionally protected health services. Congress disagreed and the following year enacted the Freedom of Access to Clinic Entrances Act.

No one has an entitlement to a lifetime slot on the federal judiciary. The burden is on the nominee to demonstrate that he or she deserves Senate confirmation. This high threshold is essential to ensure that the judiciary will continue to guard our liberties against assault.

Susan:
I don't know whether an individual (as opposed to the PAC) can pay for the plane. You'll have to get sign-off from Moose on that.

The regulation that we normally use for political travel allows for payment to be made by PACs and campaign committees only.
Moose will know if there is some other rule that allows for this.

Subject: Karl Rove's Fri, June 22 trip to Hot Springs, VA

I had submitted the paperwork for this Friday's trip thinking that Gilmore's PAC was going to be paying for the charter. Was just advised that they have secured an individual donor for the plane.

Here's what I know:
The King Air plane is privately owned by Cliff Harrup.
Cliff owns and operates a company called Central Virginia Aviation which is a charter plane company.
The company does not own the plane. Cliff owns the plane personally.
Cliff will be one of the two pilots flying Karl to Hot Springs.

When I get the fax confirming this information, I will send it to you. Do you want me to complete REVISED forms, or can you just change the info?

Sorry for the late scramble on this.

will hit newsstands in a couple days.

The ?Nastiest? Democrat
Sen. Patrick Leahy, Republican nightmare.

By Jay Nordlinger, NR?s managing editor

? Back to Top

The other Vermont senator's no day at the beach. He is Patrick Leahy, and when James Jeffords pulled his big switch, Leahy landed a big job: chairman of the Judiciary Committee. It's a job Leahy has always wanted; and a Republican nightmare has begun.

By consensus ? a consensus of Hill Republicans ? Pat Leahy is the meanest, most partisan, most ruthless Democrat in the Senate.
Ask a Republican about Leahy, and he'll shudder. Then he will say that, though Leahy can be nice and smiling on the surface, underneath he is-take your pick-"a left-wing brute," "the nastiest," "a pile of pure malice."
Republicans are not in complete agreement, however: One says, "He's the most obnoxious [SOB] in the Senate now that Howard Metzenbaum's gone"; another says, "Nah, he was always worse than Metzenbaum, it's just that the general public didn't know it." Republicans, to a man, swear that they would take Ted Kennedy, Christopher Dodd, Joe Biden, John Kerry-any famously partisan Democrat over Leahy. They were very much hoping that Biden, for example, would resume his chairmanship of the Judiciary Committee; he was chairman, recall, during the years that included the pummeling of Robert Bork and the pummeling of Clarence Thomas. Instead, however, Biden chose the Foreign Relations post, leaving Judiciary to Leahy.

And, following the ancient rule that a staff reflects the politician at its head, the consensus is that Leahy's staff is just as partisan, just as ruthless as the senator himself. Not even Democrats much trust or like that bunch. Says one veteran GOP staffer, "You can work with Kennedy's staff, you can work with Biden's-and chances are, they won't stab you in the back. Leahy's staff, however, plays to win, whatever it takes. And they'll roll over Democrats just as fast."

So, what about this "junkyard dog in a Vermont sweater" (to quote yet another staffer)? Several different Senate-watchers cite one recent episode. It's a relatively small thing, they say, but an instance in which the underside of Leahy was revealed. Sen. Strom Thurmond is almost 100 now, and when he appears at a committee meeting, he generally reads a short statement from a card, and shuffles off. You don't try to engage him in debate, or much else, anymore, and most everyone knows it, and accepts it. At a meeting in April, Thurmond read his statement as usual ? and Leahy jumped in to question him about it. Orrin Hatch, then Judiciary chairman, intervened, saying he would handle Leahy's questions himself, trying to spare Thurmond embarrassment. But Leahy kept it up. Witnesses were appalled, seeing no purpose in it except to humiliate the old man.

The public got a little taste of what a Leahy chairmanship would be like back in January, when he conducted the confirmation hearings of attorney-general nominee John Ashcroft. (Because Dick Cheney had not yet been sworn in as vice president, and the Senate was 50-50, presided over by Al Gore, Leahy had the gavel for a little over two weeks.) Leahy threw at Ashcroft everything he had, trying to sink the nomination. There were hostile witness panels, hostile allegations ? the works. Says one person close to the Ashcroft team, "Our reaction was, Wow! I mean, holy Moses! The guy's trying to slay us!" In the end, Ashcroft squeaked through, but not before being tarred before the nation as a racist, reactionary nut.

Leahy was just warming up, perhaps, for the confirmation hearings of Ted Olson, to be solicitor general. Leahy did not have the gavel then, but he led a crude assault on the nominee's integrity. Olson had been a lawyer and board member for The American Spectator magazine, which for a time ran something called "the Arkansas Project," to pursue stories in Bill Clinton's home state. Olson testified that he had nothing to do with this "project" ? but Leahy essentially accused him of lying, based on the tales of a couple of left-wing journalists with a high flake quotient.
These tales had been thoroughly discredited, and were again. Yet Leahy persisted, casting aspersions on Olson and demanding records and testimony from the Spectator (which galled First Amendment defenders in particular). Olson, like Ashcroft, in the end squeaked through ? but it seems likely that Leahy as chairman could have stopped him. From now on, he will be chairman. According to Republican fears, the Leahy years (if years they be) will make the Biden years seem like a golden age of fair play and collegiality.

One Leahy foe puts the beef of many this way: The senator "always likes to have an ethical veneer for his purely partisan attacks. He can't just say [for example] that he despises Ted Olson's views, that he resents his representation of [George W.] Bush in Bush v. Gore, that he's sorry there has to be a conservative solicitor general at all. No, he has to say that Olson lacks integrity, that he lacks honesty, and that's what stinks about Patrick Leahy."

A Senator for Life
Leahy is only 61 years old, but he is one of the most senior members of the Senate: He was 34 when he was first elected, in 1974. He was, and remains, the only Democrat ever elected to the Senate from Vermont. But times, they clearly have a-changed. Once the home of rock-ribbed Republicanism, the state is now the home of gay marriage and a remarkably left-wing congressional lineup: Leahy and Jef fords are the two senators, and Bernie Sanders, a socialist ? that is, an avowed socialist ? is the (lone) House rep. Vermont seems to have passed Massachusetts as the American Sweden; must be something in the milk.

In his 25 years as a senator, Leahy has built a solidly left-liberal record. He has his share of fans. He likes photography and the Grateful Dead. He is said to be affable in hallways, and to be a wiz at constituent services. He styles himself "the cybersenator," because of his interest in computers and the Internet. He crusades against capital punishment, and against the use of land mines. He is a great champion of trial lawyers: For example, he led the fight (a successful one) to remove the liability cap on the tobacco industry; for the lawyers, the sky was the limit. In all, Leahy is the perfect left-liberal senator, voting for higher taxes, opposing welfare reform, vilifying Ronald Reagan, denouncing Kenneth Starr as a Constitution-destroying zealot, decrying the Supreme Court that ruled after the Florida deadlock, and so on.

Throughout the '80s, Leahy was one of those Democrats most passionately opposed to Reagan in Central America-one of those who traveled to Nicaragua and tried to block the (U.S.) president at every turn. With Chris Dodd, he sponsored a bill to cut aid to El Salvador. More recently, in 1999, he traveled to Cuba, where he dined with Fidel Castro. Cuba, of course, is a country with thousands of political prisoners, a country where oppression is pervasive and torture routine. The major issue to come out of Leahy's huddle with Castro? Ice cream. You see, Fidel had spoken up for Cuba's ice cream, and Pat had put in a word for Ben & Jerry's (Vermont's own). Said the senator in a post- huddle interview, "Now my major diplomatic effort will be to get a hold of Ben Cohen [the "Ben" of the company] and figure out how they can send down a case of Ben & Jerry's. Castro made me promise I would get Ben & Jerry's ice cream to him." Then the big concern was what the dictator's favorite flavor was. It's not clear whether Castro ever got his Ben & Jerry's; it's pretty clear, however, that Leahy is not overly troubled by the fates of the ice-cream lover's victims. The statements Leahy has made about Cuba show a profound ignorance, whether willful or not, about that battered island.

Also in the '80s, Leahy gained some notoriety as a member of the Intelligence Committee. He was charged with revealing classified information during the Achille Lauro terrorist incident, outraging administration officials. And he leaked a draft report on the Iran-contra affair, leading to his resignation from the intelligence panel. Behavior like this earned for him the sobriquet "Leaky Leahy."

It is in the field of the judiciary, of course, that Leahy has made his main reputation. More than any of his colleagues, he has been "Senator No" for judges nominated by Republican presidents. He voted against William Rehnquist's elevation to chief justice. And he was a major tormentor of Robert Bork during those awful hearings of 1987. In fact, he was responsible for one of their moments of highest drama. He scolded Bork for doing insufficient charity work while a professor at Yale, and recited the fees he earned as an outside consultant during the years 1979 to 1981. Responded Bork, "Those are the only years I ever made any money in consulting." He continued, emotional, "There was a reason to get money, and I don't want to get into it here."
Leahy acknowledged that the judge had his reasons. Then Sen. Gordon Humphrey, a Republican, broke in, saying, "Judge Bork, this is a very personal question, and if you prefer not to answer it, by all means do not ? but were those years [ones that] coincided with heavy medical bills in your family?" Bork spoke one syllable: "Yeah." The bills to which Humphrey had referred were for Bork's first wife, Claire, who died in December 1980. This was not only a moment of high drama, but one that turned the stomachs of many of those watching.

Leahy furthered distinguished himself in 1991 as the first senator to come out against Clarence Thomas (this was even before the allegations of Anita Hill). He hammered Thomas relentlessly. At one point, in a typical Leahy flourish, he said, "You describe yourself as a conservative. Well, most Vermonters are conservative, too"-but Thomas, in Leahy's eyes, wasn't the right kind of conservative. Later, in a floor statement, Leahy said, "I cannot promise the people of Vermont that I'm sure this nominee will protect their rights." And he avowed, most richly, "The last thing I seek in a Supreme Court justice is ideology."

Preludes to Chairman

Leahy became a major player on the Judiciary Committee in 1987, when Democrats wrested control of the Senate from Republicans. Biden was chairman, but Leahy was named head of a task force to scrutinize (or harass or delay or upend) Republican nominees. At last, he vowed, Democrats would "play hardball" (and this was years before Chris Matthews became a national celebrity). "No iffy nominees are going to get through now," Leahy crowed. The result was that nominees, many of them, were pecked at and left twisting in the wind. Interesting, in light of a later event, is that Leahy, back in '87, faulted the American Bar Association for its recommendations on judicial nominees. He said, "I have often found the ABA process to be perfunctory at best. I've often found it inadequate." According to the Washington Post, "Leahy said his task force would interview more lawyers, litigants, and local citizens instead of relying on the ABA."
Leahy's entire approach in this period was: go slow, put the screws on, block.

Then when the Clinton administration came to power, and Republicans regained the Senate two years later, Leahy turned on a dime. Now the problem was "stalling tactics" (Republican), and the nation's courts suffered from a "vacancy crisis." Republicans were shirking their "constitutional duty," and mounting "nothing short of an attack on our independent judiciary." On CNN, Greta Van Susteren asked him, helpfully, "How can they get away with that? I mean, we've got all these vacancies." Answered Leahy, "Because the American public has not raised hell the way they should."

With the George W. Bush administration and the Jeffords flip, the pendulum has swung again: Leahy is back to go-slow. There is no more talk of a vacancy crisis or raising hell (at least the kind of hell Leahy intended for Senate Republicans). The ABA, whose role the current president has reduced, seems to be back in his good graces. Leahy is preparing new and intrusive questionnaires for Republican nominees, evidently designed to embarrass them and trip them up. He is promising hearings on the sins of the Rehnquist court and of conservative jurists generally. By every indication, he is gearing up for continual battle. During the Biden years, Leahy was only Number Two, and an enthusiastic player of "hardball." Now it may be all Borking, all the time.

No matter what the era, what the year, Leahy has been consistent on one thing: the ceaseless Republican war on "women and minorities." When Republicans have occupied the White House, they haven't appointed enough women and minorities (Reagan's record, for Leahy, was "shameful" ? this despite Justice O'Connor, apparently; no word on whether Leahy counted Justice Thomas for the first George Bush). When Clinton was there, Republican senators worked diligently to thwart women and minorities. Leahy portrayed the Republicans' 1999 rejection of Judge Ronnie White as primarily a racial tragedy. The senator is utterly in keeping with his party in painting the GOP as the enemy of black Americans.

Hill Republicans say almost as one that Leahy is grossly, grossly underrated as-to quote that earlier Republican ? "a left-wing brute." In coming months and years, the country should get to know Leahy well, especially if Bush has a chance to nominate someone to the high court. On May 17, William Safire of the New York Times used his column to chide Leahy for his offenses against the First Amendment during the Ted Olson hearings. Nevertheless, he wrote, Leahy is "the best senator the Democrats have. He is my longtime friend, a stalwart on privacy [one of the columnist's chief concerns] and totally devoid of vindictiveness." It was this last clause, in particular, that made veteran Republicans choke. As they have experienced it, Leahy is vindictive ness, or certainly severe, raw partisanship, personified. Jim Jeffords wrought a big change when he pulled his switcheroo ? and nowhere will this change be felt more acutely than on the Judiciary Committee, Sen. Patrick Leahy, chairman.

Gearing up to Vote on Court Nominees

Jonathan Ringel

Officially, the confirmation process for President George W. Bush's judicial nominees was stuck in limbo last week as Senate leaders haggled over the rules of engagement under the new Democratic majority. But beyond those negotiations, the judicial nomination process is moving ahead. Sen. Patrick Leahy, D-Vt., the new chairman of the Senate Judiciary Committee, says he will hold his first confirmation hearings about two weeks after new Majority Leader Tom Daschle, D-S.D., and Republicans come to an agreement. And an administration source says Bush is expected to name six to 10 new nominees this week, including several district court choices.

The way the Senate will treat judicial nominations is reportedly the sticking point in the secretive negotiations between Daschle and a team of five Republicans, including Sen. Orrin Hatch of Utah, the ranking minority member on the Judiciary Committee. Republicans appear to be seeking some assurances that Democrats will treat the appointees, and any potential Supreme Court nominee, with some degree of deference. Democrats, who will soon have a majority on the committee, may feel little pressure to offer anything more than their counterparts did during the Clinton administration.

Leahy has already said he will enforce the "blue slip" rule, by which the Judiciary Committee will not hold hearings or votes on nominees opposed by home-state senators. Republicans argue this rule gives individual senators too much power over presidential nominations. President Bush so far has made 17 nominations -- 15 to circuit courts of appeals and two to district courts. Around the country, 104 federal judgeships are vacant -- 33 on circuit courts and 71 on district courts. None of Bush's selections has been the subject of hearings before the Judiciary Committee.

When the committee was in its final days of Republican control, three nominees -- John Roberts Jr. for the D.C. Circuit and Sixth Circuit nominees Deborah Cook and Jeffrey Sutton -- had been scheduled to appear at a May 23 hearing. But their day before the panel was scuttled after vehement opposition by Democrats, who the next day won control of the Senate when Vermont Sen. James Jeffords announced he would defect from the GOP and become an independent. Democrats had argued that the committee should not hold hearings until the American Bar Association's standing committee on the federal judiciary had completed its reviews of nominees.

Now that things have changed, it's unlikely that Leahy would hold hearings on any nominee whose ABA rating is not completed. Leahy spokesman David Carle says the committee has received a few of the ratings so far, but is not yet prepared to make them public. While the ABA conducts an extensive background check, the reviews typically consist of only one sheet of paper describing the nominee as "well qualified," "qualified" or "not qualified." Carle also says the committee has yet to choose which of the nominees will be the first to have hearings.

The Judiciary Committee itself will undergo a change as a result of the power shift, with the likely scenario being one Democrat joining the 18-member committee to give the Democrats a one-vote majority. Leahy has spoken to former trial lawyer Sen. John Edwards of North Carolina about the slot, but no agreement has been reached. A spokeswoman for Sen. Zell Miller, a Georgia Democrat who has argued for Democrats to give great deference to President Bush's nominations, calls speculation that Miller was angling for a spot on judiciary "overblown." "He's perfectly happy with what he's got," said Miller press secretary Joan Kirchner, referring to Miller's current posts on the agriculture, banking and veterans' affairs committees.

Administration officials would not say who Bush will nominate next week, but it could be time for several previously reported candidates to have their day. Among those are U.S. Magistrate Judge William Steele of Mobile, Ala., for the Eleventh Circuit; Iowa U.S. District Judge Michael Melloy for the Eighth Circuit; and University of Utah professor Paul Cassell for a district court seat in that state. In March, Tennessee Republican Sens. Fred Thompson and Bill Frist made three recommendations for a single open seat on the Sixth Circuit. They are: Robert Echols, U.S. district chief judge in Nashville; Julia Gibbons, U.S. district chief judge in Memphis; and Lin Howard of Harwell Howard Hyne Gabbert & Manner in Nashville.

Montana may not be ground zero of the political warfare over judges, but it has gotten more than its share of attention from the Bush administration. If the Senate confirms litigator Sam Haddon and U.S. Magistrate Judge Richard Cebull, it's a good bet that folks with business before the federal court there will breathe a sigh of relief. The court has only three judges, and in the past year, Judges Jack Shanstrom and Charles Lovell took senior status, meaning they had significantly reduced their caseloads. That leaves Chief Judge Donald Molloy as the court's only active judge, He has had to focus on criminal cases in order to comply with speedy trial demands, while the civil docket has taken a back seat.

Fortunately for Molloy, Montana Sens. Conrad Burns, a Republican, and Max Baucus, a Democrat, were able to agree on recommendations for the posts. Such bipartisan agreement certainly helped speed the process at the White House and could do the same in the Senate. Meanwhile, the Montana federal court has been relying on help from nearby states. Lou Aleksich, the court clerk, says four federal judges have come to Montana to preside over civil trials this month.

Daschle Agrees to GOP Proposal for Vote on Supreme Court Nominees

Jesse J. Holland

Senators will decide whether President Bush's Supreme Court nominees get automatic confirmation votes from the full Senate without risking rejection by the Judiciary Committee, Senate Majority Leader Thomas Daschle said Tuesday.

Republicans asked for such treatment during negotiations over how to reorganize the newly Democrat-controlled Senate. The GOP is afraid that Democrats would block Bush's judicial nominations and has been looking for a way to ensure Bush's top nominees will at least make it to the floor. Daschle opposes any guarantees for Bush nominees. "We will provide them an opportunity for the vote, but I would hope the Senate would show its common sense and would vote against that particular proposal," said Daschle, D-S.D.

The GOP originally asked for guaranteed Senate votes on all Supreme Court and federal appellate court nominees and elimination of the secret veto process for some judicial nominations, but Daschle refused. The Republicans then modified their request to guaranteed Supreme Court votes only.

Democrats control the Senate by a 50-49 margin. Sen. Jim Jeffords of Vermont threw the chamber to the Democrats when he defected from the Republican Party to become the Senate's sole independent.

Daschle said he would ask his party to vote against the provision when the Senate votes. "I expect we will prevail," he said.

Calls to Republican senators involved in the negotiations with Daschle were not returned. A senior GOP leadership aide described Daschle's agreement to a vote on how Supreme Court nominees will be handled as a step in the right direction.

Daschle agreed to another Republican request: to make the senatorial "blue-slip" veto process public instead of private, as it has been in the past. "We certainly oppose private blue slips, and I'm prepared to incorporate the public blue-slip policy in the organizing resolution itself," Daschle said.

While the Senate Judiciary Committee has never in modern history kept a Supreme Court nominee from coming to a vote, the resolution would render the committee powerless to stop a future Supreme Court nominee no matter what the controlling party thinks.

"In essence, what their proposal would do is to create a 100-member judiciary committee, bypassing, if they wish, the Judiciary Committee itself. We're not prepared to do that," Daschle said. "We think that, for this institution, for careful consideration of the nominees themselves, we ought to continue to maintain the Senate practice of insisting that all nominees be considered and voted upon in the Judiciary Committee."

The provisions would only be binding on Congress until January 2003. It would also be negated if Republicans were to take back control of the chamber, which would force senators to vote on a new organizing resolution.

Daschle said Democrats would insist that changes become a permanent part of the Senate process if they are approved. "This ought not be something we just do for this Congress," he said.

The Senate will vote on the Supreme Court provision, and on reorganizing the chamber, before they leave for the Independence Day holiday, Daschle said.

The two sides also agreed that Democrats will gain a one-seat majority on each Senate committee, and the size of committees will be expanded to accommodate the one-seat Democratic edge. All Republicans will keep their committee assignments, and committee finances and space agreements negotiated at the beginning of the year will continue in effect as well.

The Senate will not work on any of Bush's nominees until after those votes, the majority leader said.

Bush has not nominated anyone for the Supreme Court because there are no openings. He has made several lower court nominations.

Despite Appearances, Confirmation Process for Judicial Nominees Makes Progress

Jonathan Ringel

WASHINGTON -- Officially, the confirmation process for President George W. Bush's judicial nominees was stuck in limbo last week as Senate leaders haggled over the rules of engagement under the new Democratic majority. But beyond those negotiations, the judicial nomination process is moving ahead.

Sen. Patrick Leahy, D-Vt., the new chairman of the Senate Judiciary Committee, says he will hold his first confirmation hearings about two weeks after new Majority Leader Tom Daschle, D-S.D., and Republicans come to an agreement. And an administration source says Bush is expected to name six to 10 new nominees soon, including several district court choices.

The way the Senate will treat judicial nominations is reportedly the sticking point in the secretive negotiations between Daschle and a team of five Republicans, including Sen. Orrin Hatch of Utah, the ranking minority member on the Judiciary committee. Republicans appear to be seeking some assurances that Democrats will treat the appointees, and any potential Supreme Court nominee, with some degree of deference. Democrats, who soon will have a majority on the committee, may feel little pressure to offer anything more than their counterparts did during the Clinton administration.

Leahy already has said he will enforce the "blue slip" rule, by which the Judiciary Committee will not hold hearings or votes on nominees opposed by home-state senators. Republicans argue this rule gives individual senators too much power over presidential nominations.

President Bush so far has made 17 nominations -- 15 to circuit courts of appeals and two to district courts. Around the country, 104 federal judgeships are vacant -- 33 on circuit courts and 71 on district courts.

None of Bush's selections have been the subject of hearings before the Judiciary Committee.

When the committee was in its final days of Republican control, three nominees -- John Roberts Jr. for the Washington, D.C., Circuit and 6th Circuit nominees Deborah Cook and Jeffrey Sutton -- had been scheduled to appear at a May 23 hearing. But the day before, the panel was scuttled after vehement opposition by Democrats, who the next day won control of the Senate when Vermont Sen. James Jeffords announced he would defect from the GOP and become an independent.

Democrats had argued that the committee should not hold hearings until the American Bar Association's Standing Committee on the Federal Judiciary had completed its reviews of nominees.

Now that things have changed, it's unlikely that Leahy would hold hearings on any nominee whose ABA rating is not completed. Leahy spokesman David Carle says the committee has received a few of the ratings so far, but is not yet prepared to make them public.

While the ABA conducts an extensive background check, the reviews typically consist of only one sheet of paper describing the nominee as "well-qualified," "qualified," or "not qualified."

Administration officials would not say whom Bush will nominate, but it could be time for several previously reported candidates to have their day.

Among those are U.S. Magistrate Judge William Steele of Mobile, Ala., for the 11th Circuit, which includes Florida; Iowa U.S. District Judge Michael Melloy, for the 8th Circuit; and University of Utah professor Paul Cassell, for a district court seat in that state.

In Florida, Republican leaders have 70 lawyers to choose from -- including prominent names and relative unknowns -- in deciding whom to recommend to Bush for three federal judgeships and three U.S. attorney spots in the state.

The two vacant judgeships in the southern district drew the most applicants. But an open seat in the middle district attracted 19 candidates. The U.S. attorney spots in the northern, middle and southern districts drew 10, nine and eight applicants, respectively. Many applicants hedged their bets by applying for more than one position.

Gov. Jeb Bush, Rep. E. Clay Shaw Jr., R-Fla., and Rep. C.W. Young, R-Fla., will pick the finalists to recommend to the White House.

Back in Familiar Role, ABA Rates 6 Judicial Nominees

Jonathan Ringel

Six of President George W. Bush's nominees for the federal appeals courts have received "qualified" or "well qualified" ratings from the American Bar Association's standing committee on the federal judiciary. These are the first ratings to come from the ABA committee since President George W. Bush in March kicked the group out of its 48-year role prescreening potential judicial nominees for the White House.

The ABA saw its stock rise again with the switch to Democratic control of the Senate, and Senate Judiciary Chairman Patrick Leahy, D-Vt., has promised to consider the evaluations before commencing hearings on any individual nominee. The panel has so far given the highest ratings to three sitting district judges seeking elevation to their appeals courts, according to documents released by the Senate Judiciary Committee and other sources. The committee unanimously gave a "well qualified" rating to Judge Barrington Parker Jr. of the federal trial court in New York, nominated for a seat on the Second Circuit U.S. Court of Appeals. Parker, an African-American, was nominated to the district court in 1994 by then-President Bill Clinton.

A majority of the ABA panel gave Judge Edith Brown Clement of the federal trial court in New Orleans, nominated for the Fifth Circuit, a "well qualified" rating. A minority of the panel rated Clement "qualified," according to the documents, and one unidentified member of the panel abstained from voting. Clement was nominated to the trial court in 1991 by then-President George Bush.

A nominee to the Fourth Circuit, Judge Dennis Shedd of the federal trial court in Columbia, S.C., also received a majority "well qualified," minority " qualified" rating, according to a source. When Bush nominated him to his current seat in 1990, Shedd, a former staffer to Sen. Strom Thurmond, R-S.C., had received a mixed "qualified/not qualified" ABA rating, according to a press account from the time. Jeffrey Sutton, a Sixth Circuit nominee, received a majority "qualified," minority "well qualified" rating. Sutton, a partner in the Columbus, Ohio, office of Jones, Day, Reavis & Pogue, has successfully argued several Supreme Court cases on behalf of litigants challenging acts of Congress as overreaching, including parts of the Violence Against Women Act and the Americans With Disabilities Act.

Ohio Supreme Court Justice Deborah Cook, also named to the Sixth Circuit, was unanimously rated "qualified." Cook, on the state high court for six years, was strongly backed in her 2000 re-election race by the Ohio business community, but opposed by African-American and plaintiffs lawyer groups. The ABA panel was also unanimous in calling Fourth Circuit Judge Roger Gregory "qualified." Gregory was a Richmond litigator until late last year, when President Clinton, in a controversial move, named him to the Fourth Circuit while Congress was out of session. Bush's decision to renominate Gregory, who is the first African-American judge on the Fourth Circuit, was seen as an attempt to mollify Democrats poised to block his nominees. A senior Bush administration official said the ratings "reaffirm the choice of these candidates as ones of high competence and integrity."

The ABA is expected to issue ratings shortly on the five other judicial nominees the president announced in May, including appellate advocates Miguel Estrada and John Roberts Jr. for the D.C. Circuit; North Carolina federal Judge Terrence Boyle for the Fourth Circuit; Texas high court Justice Priscilla Owen for the Fifth Circuit; and University of Utah law professor Michael McConnell for the 10th Circuit. President Bush has since nominated five others to circuit court posts, and three to district court posts. He announced Monday that he intends to nominate Magistrate Judge Terry Wooten to the U.S. district court in South Carolina.

The ABA panel conducts dozens of interviews with lawyers, judges and others regarding each nominee, evaluates the nominees' qualifications with regard to integrity, professional competence and judicial temperament, and hands out one of three ratings: "well qualified," "qualified," and "not qualified." The committee consists of one member from each of 12 federal judicial circuits, two from the huge Ninth Circuit and a chairwoman, Patricia Hynes of Milberg, Weiss, Bershad, Hynes & Lerach. Ever since the ABA committee gave mixed ratings to Republican Supreme Court nominees Robert Bork (the majority found him "well qualified" while the minority said he was "not qualified") and Clarence Thomas (the majority said " qualified," the minority "not qualified"), the committee has come under strong criticism from conservatives.

In March, the Bush administration removed the group from its formal role. White House Counsel Alberto Gonzales said at the time that the president did not want to give the ABA a

"preferential" role above other groups that could weigh in on the judiciary. Liberal groups decried the decision for removing an important peer review from the process and said it was a sign that Bush was trying to ease the way to push the judiciary to the right. Leahy would not comment on individual nominees Monday, according to a spokesman. Leahy has said he expects to hold hearings on nominees about two weeks after the Senate leadership completes reorganization negotiations.

Bush Wants Cassell as Judge

Lee Davidson

WASHINGTON -- President Bush has nominated University of Utah law professor Paul G. Cassell to become a judge in the U.S. District Court for Utah.

If confirmed by the Senate, Cassell would replace retired Judge David Sam.

Cassell, who was nominated Tuesday, is considered an expert on victims rights. He represented relatives of victims of the Oklahoma City bombing who wanted to attend the trial of Timothy McVeigh but had been excluded by a judge's order.

While he initially lost the case seeking to allow them to attend, he turned to Congress and helped push through a victims-rights bill in two weeks that forced the judge to allow their attendance.

"The judicial system would be a much better place if we had more Paul Cassells and Judge (Richard) Matschs (who refused to block McVeigh's execution)," said Marsha Kight, with the National Organization for Victims Assistance. Her daughter, Frankie Merrell, was killed in the Oklahoma City bombing.

"He'll make an excellent judge," she said, praising Cassell's representation of her and other relatives of Oklahoma City bombing victims.

Calls to Cassell and the law school for comment on his nomination were not immediately returned.

Cassell also argued but lost a high-profile case before the Supreme Court seeking to allow some confessions to stand even if police failed to give "Miranda" warnings telling those interrogated that they have the right to remain silent.

Cassell, 41, has been a professor of law at the University of Utah since 1992.

He was an assistant U.S. attorney in the Eastern District of Virginia from 1988-91, and was an associate deputy U.S. attorney general from 1986-88.

Cassell was a law clerk for Warren E. Burger, former chief justice of the United States, from 1985-86. He was also a clerk for Antonin Scalia (now a U.S. Supreme Court justice) when he was a judge on the U.S. District Court of Appeals in Washington, D.C.

Cassell received his law degree from Stanford University in 1984, and received his bachelor's degree there in 1979.

He was admitted to the bar in Pennsylvania in 1986 and to the Utah bar in 1992.

Cassell is the second University of Utah law professor to be nominated by Bush for a judgeship. Michael W. McConnell was nominated to the Denver-based 10th Circuit Court of Appeals. His nomination is also pending before the Senate Judiciary Committee.

Utah Law Professor Nominated for Federal Bench

Paul Foy

President Bush has nominated University of Utah law professor Paul Cassell to replace U.S. District Court Judge David Sam.

Cassell, 42, is a conservative legal scholar who has criticized the aggressive federal prosecution of Salt Lake's Olympic bid leaders.

He also is a victims' rights advocate who argued before the U.S. Supreme Court last year that some criminal confessions should stand even when police fail to give suspects the Miranda warning on their right to remain silent. The court disagreed.

Cassell was an assistant U.S. attorney in the Eastern District of Virginia from 1988-91, and associate deputy U.S. attorney general from 1986-88.

He was sponsored by Sen. Orrin Hatch, R-Utah, for the federal bench and nominated by President Bush on Tuesday.

"It's obviously a great opportunity to serve on the bench and I'm honored the president has put my name forward," Cassell said Wednesday in San Diego, Calif., where he was vacationing with his wife and three children.

If confirmed by the U.S. Senate, Cassell would take on the full-time vacancy opened in Utah in late 1999 when Sam went on senior, semiretired status. Sam will continue to handle some cases and has been assigned to preside over the Olympic bribery trial of Salt Lake bid chief Tom Welch and his deputy, Dave Johnson. The trial is set to begin July 16.

Cassell's nomination to the bench silenced his often provocative critique of the government's case. He was no apologist for Welch and Johnson, but Cassell argued the U.S. Justice Department devised elaborate conspiracy, fraud and racketeering theories when simpler charges would suffice.

Welch and Johnson were indicted by a federal grand jury on charges of conspiring over a decade to bribe the International Olympic Committee by plying its members with $1 million in cash, scholarships, travel, medical care and excessive gifts. The defendants maintain they did nothing criminally wrong or different from other bid cities.

Cassell doesn't expect to handle any aspect of the Olympic case. He would take one of five full-time positions at the U.S. District Court for Utah, which has been understaffed for a year. Each judge handles about 100 criminal and 300 civil cases a year.

Sam, 67, handles about half of the usual caseload of full-time judges as a semi-retired judge.

Cassell represented families of victims of the Oklahoma City bombing who were initially barred from attending the trial of Timothy McVeigh, who was executed June 11.

He helped usher a victims' rights bill through Congress that forced the judge in the McVeigh case to make room for the victims' relatives at trial.

"He'll make an excellent judge," Marsha Kight, whose daughter was killed in the blast, told the Deseret News.

Cassell was a law clerk for former Supreme Court Chief Justice Warren E. Burger from 1985-86. He served as clerk to Antonin Scalia, now a Supreme Court justice, when Scalia was on the U.S. District Court of Appeals in Washington, D.C.

Cassell received bachelor's and law degrees from Stanford University and was admitted to the Pennsylvania bar in 1986 and the Utah bar in 1992.

He is the second University of Utah law professor to be nominated by Bush for a judgeship. Michael W. McConnell's nomination to the Denver-based 10th Circuit Court of Appeals is pending before the Senate Judiciary Committee.

Ready to Rumble

Byron York

In coming weeks, Democrats on the Senate Judiciary Committee plan to hold a series of hearings which they say will help clarify the issues involved in the judicial-confirmation process - and which Republicans believe will serve to establish a legal and political basis for rejecting George W. Bush's nominees for federal judgeships.

Next Tuesday, New York Democrat Charles Schumer, the new chairman of the Subcommittee on Administrative Oversight and the Courts, will hold a hearing entitled, "Should Ideology Matter? Judicial Nominations 2001." Next month, according to Senate sources, committee chairman Patrick Leahy will hold hearings to discuss the Rehnquist Court, federal jurisprudence, and conservative judicial activism.

Republicans believe the hearings will amount to a one-two punch against Bush's nominees. The Schumer session will establish that it is acceptable to oppose nominees solely on ideological grounds, and the Leahy hearing will suggest that Bush's nominees hold views that are dangerously out of touch with those of most Americans. The end result will be the conclusion that Democrats are justified in voting against the president's nominees, even if they seem well-qualified to hold office.

Democrats deny that there is any overarching strategy at work. "Basically, the senator wants to take a look at how we should view the process for confirming judges," says Schumer spokesman Bradley Tusk. "What role should ideology play? I think there's some confusion on how we should deal with the issue."

Nevertheless, the witness lists for the hearings are likely to be tilted in favor of the emerging Democratic consensus that senators can legitimately vote against judges on the basis of ideology alone. In the past, senators who disagreed with a nominee's judicial philosophy have often been forced to search for a disqualifying flaw on which they could base their opposition, while steadfastly maintaining that ideology had nothing to do with it.

For example, in the 1987 fight over the Supreme Court nomination of Robert Bork, wrote the Washington Post's E.J. Dionne in an influential recent column, "Liberals couldn't simply oppose Bork. To block him, they had to trash him." Now, Dionne continued, Democrats are "no longer shilly-shallying. They're saying, right from the start, that they'll oppose judicial nominees on philosophical grounds alone."

Republicans have gotten the message. "They're laying the groundwork," one GOP aide says of the Democrats' plans. "They're trying to paint all of our judges as right-wing extremists who are here to turn back the clock on civil rights. To be mainstream and moderate, therefore, they have to stop them."

Meanwhile, as Schumer and Leahy plan their hearings, the work of actually confirming the president's nominees has ground to a halt. No hearings have been scheduled for the confirmation of any of the nearly two-dozen nominees so far announced by the White House.

Organizing Talks Go On, But Daschle Readies For Showdown

Charlie Mitchell and Geoff Earle

Senate Majority Leader Daschle could bring up a new organizational resolution for the Senate as early as this week--a move that could allow committees to function normally, while putting an end to weeks of contentious negotiations. Nevertheless, Daschle and a team of GOP negotiators continued to exchange communications Tuesday--a sign that a chance remained for the two sides to broker a final deal and avoid a partisan fight on the Senate floor.

Daschle told reporters that he would bring up a resolution this week that reflects areas on which Republicans and Democrats can agree, while allowing Republicans to offer amendments to address their concerns about moving judicial nominees. But a team of GOP negotiators met in Minority Leader Lott's office Tuesday evening to prepare yet another Republican offer for Daschle.

"I think we're sending him something that will be worthy of consideration," said Sen. Pete Domenici, R-N.M. Said Sen. Phil Gramm, R-Texas; "The whole thing might be avoided. We might have an agreement." Gramm downplayed the idea of a GOP filibuster to block an organizing resolution.

Daschle addressed reporters after meeting with his Democratic colleagues to describe an earlier offer from the GOP negotiating team on the organizing resolution. He said the Democratic Caucus was "disappointed" in the GOP offer, adding, "My five Republican colleagues have chosen to terminate the negotiations."

Daschle said he had hoped to avoid a partisan floor fight over the organizing resolution. Nevertheless, allowing a vote on the GOP proposals would give Republicans something they had been seeking in talks with Daschle last week.

Daschle rejected GOP demands for a "guarantee" that judicial nominations would come to a vote, saying such an approach "undermines" the Senate.

"What they want is a 100-member Judiciary Committee, [and] we're not prepared to do that," Daschle said.

Other Democrats echoed that sentiment at the Tuesday meeting of their Caucus.

"I don't know of a self-respecting member of a committee who would tolerate bypassing their committee," said Sen. Christopher Dodd, D-Conn. Daschle said he had asked Lott to offer specific proposals on the two issues Republicans raised, and he expected Democrats had the votes to head off the GOP proposal. "My guess is it would be pretty much a party-line vote," said a Democratic aide.

Daschle said Democrats were willing to accept a GOP proposal to make public the "blue slip" process--by which a single senator can block action on a judicial nominee. He noted that Sen. Richard Durbin, D-Ill., proposed such a move in 1997, only to draw opposition from then-Judiciary Chairman Hatch.

"I just hope they would support this for future Congresses, not just this Congress," Daschle said of Republicans. The Democratic aide said Republicans "made clear" that they would not filibuster the organizing resolution if they received votes on their proposals. Dodd said if Republicans decided to hold up the Senate's business over the organizing resolution, "you open yourself up to looking terribly petty."

Another Democratic aide said preparations were under way for Majority Whip Reid to move into the choice office space now occupied by Minority Whip Nickles. Republicans and Democrats have said they generally agree on issues of staff, office space and a one-seat Democratic majority on committees, all of which are also in the organizing resolution.

The negotiations over Senate organization took place behind the scenes as Daschle struggled to bring managed care legislation to the floor despite GOP objections (see related article, page 12).

The Senate reached a unanimous consent agreement late Tuesday to schedule a vote on a motion to proceed to the bill Thursday morning. Daschle had indicated earlier in the day that he would file a cloture motion on the bill if a UC could not be reached. Daschle said it was important for the Senate to complete managed care legislation before the July Fourth recess, while also mentioning an FY01 defense supplemental appropriations bill--in order to leave the rest of July available to move appropriations bills.

Senate Republicans had objected to a Democratic motion to proceed to the patients' rights bill, and Daschle indicated he was prepared to file a cloture motion Tuesday that would lead to a cloture vote Thursday.

Amid signs of GOP foot-dragging, Daschle also threatened to cut into the precious July Fourth recess to complete action on the managed care bill. "I'll see you for the fireworks on the Fourth," Daschle told reporters. Republicans warned they were in no hurry to rush through that measure.

"Washington, D.C., is a very interesting place on July Fourth," said Nickles, who added, "Whether we're in for a couple of days [during the planned break] is irrelevant." But Nickles stressed that Republicans would do battle over the substance of the bill and had "no intention of filibustering this bill."

Still, Lott has not ruled out the possibility of a filibuster to block the measure. Republicans objected to a motion to proceed to the bill, on the grounds that they had not been given a chance to review changes made to the legislation last week.

Sen. Judd Gregg, R-N.H., said Daschle had been "a bit autocratic" in his decision to bring up the bill, adding, "I think we need a couple of days to talk about what the bill is."

Daschle laughed off GOP charges that the legislation had been secretly rewritten, saying he was bringing up the same bill listed on the Senate calendar.

Daschle and Reid stressed that the Senate would work through the July Fourth recess if necessary to complete work on the patients' rights bill. But, under those circumstances, Daschle said the chamber would be off July Fourth for the day.

Picking Judges: Democrats Should Stand Their Ground
Edward Lazarus

With the power shift on Capitol Hill, the issue of how the Senate should approach President Bush's judicial nominations has moved to center stage. Both sides already have staked out positions on the substantive question of what standards senators should use in evaluating Bush's picks for the federal bench.

Echoing the theme of Democrats when Clinton's nominees were pending, Republicans now argue that the Senate should confirm all "qualified" nominees (based on their credentials) regardless of ideology. Meanwhile, Democrats, borrowing the GOP tune of the past eight years, respond that the Senate has an obligation to reject ideological "extremists."

Both responses are confused and inadequate. The GOP approach is wrongheaded, because a judicial nominee's ideology cannot be separated from his qualifications. On the contrary, ideology is an inevitable part of a nominee's suitability for the federal bench.

For their part, the Democrats are wrong to suggest that ideologically conservative nominees are "extremist." Generally speaking, Bush's nominees, even the very conservative ones, are mainstream participants in the contemporary debate over how judges should interpret the Constitution.

Twisting the record of nominees in order to cast them as extremists is both destructive and unnecessary. Every senator, Democrat and Republican alike, has a duty to assess a nominee's judicial values and methods against his or her own standard for how judges should interpret the Constitution and federal law. And every senator has the right to reject a nominee for the simple reason that the senator believes the nominee's approach to legal issues to be importantly wrong -- even if not extremist.

Our legal culture is riven into two factions. Basically, the "liberals" would preserve Roe v. Wade and affirmative action, support a rigorous separation of church and state, are skeptical of the death penalty, and believe that the Constitution vests broad power in the federal government even at the expense of states' rights. Legal "conservatives" hold diametrically opposite views.

As a candidate, Bush promised that adherence to the conservative side of this debate – the side embodied by Justices Antonin Scalia and Clarence Thomas -- would be an essential qualification for nomination to the federal bench. As president, Bush has redeemed this promise.

Taking the advice of very conservative advisers, Bush has selected a core group of highly credentialed, conservative ideologues for placement on those appellate courts (such as the 6th, 10th and D.C. circuits) that are closely divided between liberals and conservatives. On these battleground circuits, a single new judge might tip the political balance of an appellate court to the conservative side. Meanwhile, Bush carefully assigned his more moderate nominees to circuits that are so overwhelmingly liberal or conservative that the views of one new appointee will have little impact.

This clever strategy is not inappropriate. In presidential elections, voters choose one candidate over another in part because they believe he will nominate judges who share a certain vision of the Constitution and the proper judicial role. American history is replete with examples of presidents seeking to perpetuate their legacies by filling the judiciary with like-minded judges.

By the same token, however, Democratic senators owe a duty to their constituents to refuse confirmation on the same overtly ideological grounds. If our divided government is any measure, the nation as a whole is evenly split between the liberal and conservative approaches to constitutional law. And it thus is incumbent on Senate Democrats to ensure that the federal courts -- the independent third branch of government -- reflect the nation's profound ambivalence.

This principle should apply to even the best of Bush's ideological nominees -- at the moment, Michael McConnell, Bush's selection for the U.S. Court of Appeals for the 10th Circuit (which presides over federal cases in Colorado, Kansas, New Mexico, Oklahoma, Utah and Wyoming).

McConnell's credentials are impressive. He has distinguished himself as a constitutional law scholar and has handled numerous important constitutional law cases. Those who know him, including liberals, say his temperament is suited to being a judge.

But from a Democratic perspective, McConnell is also profoundly wrong in his approach to the Constitution. First, he is (like Robert Bork) an adherent of the school of constitutional thought that asserts judges should interpret the Constitution according to the "original intent" of the Framers.

As was shown in the Bork hearings, this approach is irremediably flawed. Divining the Framers' intent is usually impossible (for one thing, the various Framers were rarely of one mind). Moreover, experience with Scalia, Thomas and other originalist practitioners shows that their search for original intent is little more than a cloak conservative judges use to dress up their value-laden decisions in the neutral garb of historical inquiry.

On specific issues, although McConnell may not be on record opposing Roe v. Wade, his originalist approach is antithetical to Roe and makes his opposition a foregone conclusion. McConnell is very much on record, moreover, on another hot-button issue: An avowed fundamentalist Christian, he is arguably the legal world's leading advocate for lowering the wall of separation between church and state.

None of these views -- which many conservatives share -- makes McConnell an extremist. Indeed, McConnell is more moderate than most conservatives on some issues. At bottom, though, McConnell follows a deeply troubled methodology to reach deeply troubling conclusions. And that is grounds enough for rejecting him.

In short, Democratic senators have the right -- and even a duty -- to force the administration into a compromise on judicial nominations so that the federal courts, now evenly balanced, will continue to reflect the close division in the electorate at large. Such a compromise might involve jointly identifying judicial moderates (a rare breed) or taking turns in choosing judges for the battleground circuit courts. But in the meantime, Democrats should honestly and without apology have the courage of their convictions. They should just say no. The writer is author of "Closed Chambers: The Rise, Fall, and Future of the Modern Supreme Court."

Doing Business in the Senate

Editorial

The organizing process undertaken by the Senate every two years usually occurs with little fuss. But with a newly constituted Senate now in Democratic control, what used to be a routine housekeeping chore has become a focus of partisan impasse. Republicans are demanding a ban on a parliamentary tactic employed in the past to block some judicial nominations, and they are seeking guarantees that all Supreme Court nominations will be brought to the Senate floor, even if they are rejected in committee. This is a case that can be resolved with some good will. Democrats should give in on one but not both the Republican requests.

The irony, not to say audacity, of the Republican demands is striking. For the six years that Republicans controlled the Senate, they routinely obstructed President Bill Clinton's judicial nominations, often refusing even to hold hearings or a vote in the Judiciary Committee. This page deplored such tactics, so the Democrats' pledge to hold hearings and votes in committee is most welcome. Another tactic used by the Republicans was the so-called "blue slip," in which a senator from the home state of a judicial nominee could anonymously block that nominee from being considered. Despite using that tactic in the past, Republicans are now demanding that any senator using the blue slip be identified. The demand is no doubt galling to Democrats, but they should nevertheless accept it.
Senators who block a nomination from their home state should have the courage to do so publicly.

A separate demand by the Republicans is less worthy of approval. They are asking for a change in Senate rules that would require any nomination for the Supreme Court to be sent to the full Senate even if it is rejected in committee. The fact is that, except for one historical oddity when there was a nomination for a seat that was not yet vacant, neither Republicans nor Democrats can find a case in which a Supreme Court nomination was not submitted to the full Senate. The nominations for Supreme Court of Robert Bork and Clarence Thomas were both voted on by the Senate, even though Mr. Bork was rejected by a majority in committee and Judge Thomas got a tie vote.

Tom Daschle, the Senate majority leader, has promised that the Democrats will give full and fair consideration to all judicial nominations. Citing the Bork and Thomas precedents, he has indicated that he fully expects Supreme Court nominations to be treated as in the past.

Senate rules have for many decades empowered committees to vet nominations and decide whether to approve them. Changing the rules now would undermine the power of the committee at just the time when its new chairman, Patrick Leahy of Vermont, has promised to process the nominations in an evenhanded, open fashion. The Republicans should take him at his word and not try to force an artificial arrangement just because they fear the Democrats will behave as badly as the Republicans did under President Clinton. Above all, Republicans should not be trying to block the Senate from proceeding with its business by demanding arbitrary new rules of the Democrats.

Clinton Nominee Kent Markus: Judicial Nomination Delays Are Hurting The Country

Julie Samuels

As Democrats and Republicans work out a new power-sharing deal in the Senate, the issue of judicial nominees remains a major point of contention. With Democrats controlling the agenda, will President Bush's nominees even get confirmation hearings? Will the Republicans make committee assignments if they don't?

National Journal.com's Julie Samuels spoke with Kent Markus, former counselor to Clinton Attorney General Janet Reno and a onetime judicial nominee himself, about the process, the lack of judges on today's federal bench and how this might all play out in the Democratic-led Senate.

Q. Briefly walk me through the process of your nomination and the experience you had as an example of how the process works -- or maybe doesn't always work. Well, mine was a nomination for a federal appellate court, and I think already it's worth mentioning that the process is quite radically different for the appellate courts as compared with the district courts. Because the appellate court selections are primarily managed, controlled, decided by the White House and the Justice Department, mostly the White House, whereas the district court appointments are pretty much decided by local officials in the state in which the opening exists, usually the United States senators....And so, because we were talking about an appellate court position, mine was mostly a conversation that was taking place among Washington folk. I learned -- through a friend -- that [Judge] Dave Nelson on the 6th Circuit had sent a letter in to the Justice Department indicating an intention some months later to take senior status. That triggered the whole discussion. This was in the mid- to late summer of 1999. The friend at Justice called and said, "You know, we've got this letter, are you interested in the seat?" And I said, "Yes, I'm very interested in the seat."

That began a process of trying to persuade various critical decision makers that I was the right person to be nominated for that seat. I think to the extent that anyone suggests that this is a process -- for any of these court positions -- that you get a call one day from some official calling you to public service because they've researched the backgrounds of all conceivable candidates and determined that you are by far the most worthy isn't telling you the truth. I mean, I don't know anybody who's been involved in any of these conversations that doesn't engage, even though it may be sort of an awkward word to use in this context, in something resembling a campaign to obtain one of these appointments. I think people like to pretend it's substantially more gentile than that, but it isn't. So, I undertook efforts to have various people communicate simultaneously with both the White House and Justice Department and especially key decision makers there that I would be a good nominee for the spot. And these were all people that knew me. I had worked as Attorney General [Janet] Reno's counselor at the Justice Department -- the highest-ranking staff-adviser to the attorney general, so I knew almost everybody who was being communicated with, and yet it still was a process you have to go through to persuade them that, among other conceivable nominees, you're the right one.

At the same time, I was also trying to make sure that, because I had two United States senators from the opposite political party here in Ohio, that were I able to persuade the White House that this was the way to go, that the United States senators were not going to be opposed to my selection. And so there was a similar effort going with Senator [George] Voinovich and even more particularly Senator [Mike] DeWine, since he was senior senator from Ohio and on the Judiciary Committee....And then... nothing happened for a while. And then there was delay and delay and delay, and I would talk to friends who were involved in the weekly meetings at the White House -- "Did the seat come up for discussion this week?"; "No, we didn't get to it, we didn't talk about it"; "Oh, it got mentioned and so-and-so said they heard from so-and-so about you" -- and I sort of would get little bits and scraps and pieces and, you know, my reaction was, "Jeez, I'm peculiarly well-connected, as compared to many people going through this, and still, I can only get little bits and scraps and pieces of information about what's going on and is there really a delay for some substantial reason, that there's a concern about whether I'm the right nominee and they're looking at others, or is it just that other matters are taking a higher priority, or what's going on?"

Just as magically, at some point it finally breaks, and that took until about December. And it was in, if I recall, the third week of December that I finally got the call from the White House saying, "We intend to proceed with your nomination, assuming that everything's OK."

At that point you then begin a much more cumbersome process where you are provided an extraordinary set of forms and questionnaires -- one for the White House, one for the FBI, one for the Justice Department, one for the Senate and Judiciary Committee and one for the administrative office of the courts.... The moment they say "go," in terms of putting together the forms and submitting them, the hurry-up-and-wait process then becomes another hurry-up process because they then, once they've made the decision, want you to get everything in as quickly as you possibly can so that it can be scrutinized and a final determination can be made as to whether you are in fact going to be nominated or whether all these materials and background checks will reveal some problem....

So, you're going nuts trying to put all of this together and get it in. Simultaneously, as soon as you get it in, not only does it trigger the White House own internal evaluation of everything and the FBI check to make sure you're not a drug dealer or you're not beating your spouse or whatever, but that the [American Bar Association] check then began. And they have their own whole process, where they not only interview you, but they interviewed a wide range of people in your legal community and others about you and your integrity and your experience and your knowledge of the law and all those kind of things, for their rating process.... So, you go through with that whole process -- and that all went on from about the third week in December -- in what in this context was considered very speedy – to a nomination on February 9....

From that point, the goal was obviously to seek and obtain a hearing and get a positive confirmation vote and then get a vote of the full Senate with respect to confirmation. One of the critical intermediary steps to be getting such a hearing was, and to this day still remains much in the news, the blue slips returned from your two home-state senators.

I had two Republican senators, and the White House had expressed some skepticism about whether I was going to be able to get two blue slips returned, and I think, in the end, I was the only court of appeals nominee in the country who had blue slips returned by two home-state Republican senators, both saying: "We have no objection to this nominee. You can go ahead and hold hearings if you chose to." But, again, that took time and persuasion and encouragement and there were editorials in the newspapers across the state encouraging the senators to not let this position remain open... and finally Senators Voinovich and DeWine both returned their blue slips to [then Senate Judiciary Committee] Chairman [Orrin] Hatch, [R-Utah], which was yet another critical hurdle covered.... Then it was a whole lobbying process of -- in the election year and in the context in which there was clearly a desire by many to simply say: " Look, we're just not going to confirm people this year, especially court of appeals nominees. Let's hold these seats open, see if we win the White House, and if we do, we get to fill those seats rather than the other guys."

And, in the end, that's exactly what happened to me and lots and lots of other people, and it wasn't even -- I think, to my knowledge -- anything that was focused on any substantial way on me personally. It was just a relatively across-the-board decision among the majority in the Senate... and the strategy paid off.

Q. What do you think about the blue-slip process? A. I don't think it's a good process, and I am one of the people who was not a victim of it. There were others like me who were awaiting confirmation hearings, [and] that was the hurdle they couldn't get across.... I actually had hoped, and the White House had hoped, that being in the somewhat extraordinary position of having two Republican senators return blue slips for a Democratic nominee, might have been enough to break through. And it even might have been something that Hatch could have used as an excuse to say, "Look, I'm not a terrible bad guy, here's a guy who got blue slips returned by his two Republican senators and we moved and proceeded to a hearing on him." That still didn't do it for me.

Even though I wasn't the victim of the process, at least at that point, I just think that it's an inappropriate prerogative, and that's all it is. It's a prerogative that's afforded the individual senators, and I think that I'd rather have... a more deliberative process where we look at candidates, we make a decision, and vote them up or down. I think the big unfortunate part is I think the reason there's such a reluctance to give up that prerogative is that it's substantially politically easier to simply to have nothing happen than to vote against.

Q. It sounded like the longest delay you faced was from the end of September to December. I was curious as to where you think these delays tend to come from.
A. I think they come from everywhere. I think they come -- in terms of the White House decision making -- I do think they come primarily from a combination of managing competing objectives and competing interests and competing candidates and all of that playing out in the decision making. And the general state of affairs that I experienced at high levels of the Justice Department and that I saw at high levels of the White House is you never have time to do all the things you're supposed to be doing.

And so even things that are objectively reasonably important matters suddenly become not terribly important compared to other things that are much more important.... I think when you combine that bureaucratic aspect to it with the political aspect of having to decide among competing candidates, those combine in a nefarious way to result in a delay...

Q. In a broader sense, how do you think the process changed after the 1987 Robert Bork hearings, if it did change at all?

A. I think in general that was a contributor to a sense of a need for tit-for-tat paybacks for actual and perceived slights by both parties. I think it's actually consistent with changes in the Congress that have absolutely nothing to do with nominations. My perception, throughout the '90s, is that Congress became a substantially less civil place, that there was substantially less accommodation that took place among members.... It became a substantially more partisan place. It became a meaner place. I think that was just one aspect and one manifestation of it that had an impact, particularly on nominees.

Q. Do you personally think that a nominee who might be seen as too idealistic is qualified to sit on a federal bench?

A. Depends on what you mean by "too idealistic." ... I think quite clearly being idealistic alone is not disqualifying. I think the critical question in addition to standard qualifying questions... is "What is your view of the role of a judge?" You can be as ideological as you want to be if you don't have any intent or desire to try to foist your own ideological perspective upon the system through your position as a judge. That is, whatever your privately-held views are, so what? -- if you don't seek to impose those views from the bench.... I am not particularly enamored with judges who substantially invade the purview of the legislative branch, and that's something that is loosely referred to as being activist. Unfortunately, I think that term has become very politically charged and one of those terms that's come to mean whatever anybody wants it to mean. But, I think historically, I think it's how much restraint the judge demonstrates vis-à-vis the operations of the other branches, and I think that I'm very uncomfortable with the amount of activism -- with the amount of invasion of the legislative and executive branches -- we're seeing on the judiciary right now.... If someone is highly ideological but also has a very limited and constricted view of the role of judge, I don't have a problem with that person. I have a problem with them if they are highly ideological, and they're on a mission to effectuate that ideology once they get on the bench.

Q. As far as ABA ratings go, I'd like to talk about those for a second because, especially since the power switch -- when Bush first came into office, he said "we aren't going to use them," and then the Democrats came into the majority, and they said, "well, now we are..."

A. And I think even before the power switch the Democrats had said, "you may not be going to use them, but we still want them...." And they had made pretty clear that they were going to wait for an ABA recommendation before they were going to be willing to schedule hearings with regards to candidates who had been nominated. So that, even before the power switch, the effect would have been that the White House would not have had the advantage of information about the ABA's views and ratings before finalizing the nomination decision. They would have finalized their nomination decision and then learned about what the ABA's view is, which I thought was a little risky on their behalf.

That's if they cared one wit about what the ABA said, which apparently they didn't. And so, I think that this power switch has only heightened that a little bit more, which has given Democrats the ability to say: "Look, we really mean that. We're not proceeding with the nominations until we know what the ABA says. And now we control the committee schedule, and we're going to wait for that."

Q. So the role that they're going to play has not changed?

A. I think it's only changed in... timing. It no longer is being used as an element of the White House decision making as to whether to proceed with a contemplated nomination. Instead, the recommendation will come out after the White House decides to make a nomination and will be used primarily in the context of making confirmation decisions.

Q. Right now, there's more than 100 judicial vacancies in the federal court system, which is the most since 1997. How serious of a problem is that?

A. There's a serious problem with respect to the delay, and, in the most cliché of ways, you really have a "justice delayed is justice denied" phenomenon going on. Even while my nomination was pending for the 6th Circuit, and that's now eight, nine months ago when I was involved with these conversations still, the 6th Circuit was a great example. It had become because of the number of vacancies that existed then, the slowest circuit in the country -- the time of argument to the time of decision, with cases averaging in excess of two years to get a decision out of the appeals court. That's crazy. And since that time, there are additional vacancies on the 6th Circuit.

So the suggestions that we can stand to have continuing delays in the fillings of these positions I think is wrong. And I think that the Democrats on the Judiciary Committee are in an awkward position.... They might like to engage in more tit-for-tat; they're angry about what was done to some of the nominees in the Clinton administration. They also full-well recognize that it is just not good for the country and for the system to continue to delay in filling these positions.

Q. As far as the power shift goes, how do you see that affecting the nominating process?

A. I think it's undeniable that it's going to slow it down. I hope that it does not go to a stall, a delay, a blockage. Again, I just think that's wrong. And maybe I'm more acutely cognizant of that having been a victim of that, but I just think it's not good for the court, it's not good for the country, it's not good for litigants, it's not good for the Congress -- it makes them look bad -- and it's terribly, terribly unfair to the nominees....

Q. Do you think it will change the nominees that come out of the White House?

A. I think it will. [Rep.] Chris Cox, [R-Calif., who recently withdrew his name from consideration] is already an example of that. I think there was a recognition that while [Republicans] controlled the committee, they have an ability to push a little harder with respect to getting people through. Look at the Ted Olson [for solicitor general] vote -- there was a lot of reluctance and grumbling, but it went through, and Ted was confirmed. I think that's a different dynamic now.... When the Republicans controlled the committee, they could make Democrats vote against nominees. When the Democrats are controlling the committee, they can make it so they don't have to vote against the nominees because they can make it so the nominee never comes up for a vote.

Q. How do you see the power shift changing potential Supreme Court justice nominees, should there be any?

A. Same way.... More ability on the Democrats to insist on a more moderate nominee, more ability to insist on whatever a time they need to be adequate for scrutiny. I mean, it's an agenda-controlling power, and that process impact has a substance impact.

Q. Do you expect to see a similar situation at the end of a Bush term, or a Bush administration? Do you expect to see nominees left hanging, as you were?

A. I think there will be nominees left hanging at the end of every administration. And there have been, if you look historically, some number of nominees left hanging at the end of every administration. I think the thing that was discouraging and problematic about 2000 was that the slow-down in confirming nominees began much, much earlier than it ever had historically and the sort of line-in-the-sand decision by the majority at that time, that no more, especially no more appellate court nominees, were going to get through, came much earlier.... So that it was more and earlier and the thing I worry about -- and I worry about the Democrats doing it, too -- is saying, "fine, you did it more and earlier, we'll do it even more and even more earlier." We start slowing down after the first year in the administration? You know, the president's president for four years, and while I recognize that inevitably you are going to have political things that are going to result in some nominees being left hanging, especially those nominated late, very late, in the administration, a few months left, I actually think that President Bush's suggestion during the campaign was a pretty good one if it could be done as a practical matter. That unless there's a specific, individual reason not to do so, every nominee ought to have a hearing and a vote within 60 days.

Q. What do you think could be done to expedite the process?

A. At the nomination stage, there's cautiousness on the part of the White House as the nominating entity to do everything they can to avoid political embarrassment from nominating somebody who has some stain on their background, and they want to avoid that by finding out everything they possibly can about that nominee in advance, so that if there is something there they don't like, they can decide, "well then, we're not going to nominate that person." But that causes extraordinary delay and is highly intrusive sort of well beyond what I think anybody would think was rational or normal. And it's all about political defense on the part of the nominating entity. And the same thing that goes on with respect to the confirmation process is that -- and that's more I think on political offense -- people are attacked and are charicaturized and defined in very simplistic terms because that's politically convenient to do and may appeal to interest groups and others in a way that is terribly unfair and dangerous to nominees...

Q. Is there anything else you'd like to discuss?

A. I went back... and I pulled a column that I had read from the Washington Post on April 1 -- I think it was intended as an April Fool's Day column. Because there was a line in it that I remembered... where the guy writing the story says: "The nomination system is a national disgrace. It encourages bullies and emboldens demagogues, silences the voices of responsibility, and nourishes the lowest forms of partisan combat. It uses innocent citizens as pawns in politicians' petty games and stains the reputations of good people. It routinely violates fundamental democratic principles, undermines the quality and consistency of public management, and breaches simple decency." And I remember, when I read it originally, I went, "Yeah, that's right."

Democrats Must Demand Fair Split Among Judges

Edward Lazarus

With the power shift on Capitol Hill, the issue of how the Senate should approach President George W. Bush's judicial nominations takes center stage. Both parties have staked out positions on the question of what standards senators should use in evaluating Bush's picks for the federal bench. Echoing the theme of Democrats when former President Bill Clinton's nominees were pending, Republicans now argue that the Senate should confirm all "qualified" nominees regardless of ideology.

Meanwhile, Democrats, borrowing the GOP tune of the past eight years, respond that the Senate has an obligation to reject "extremists." Both responses are inadequate. The GOP approach is wrongheaded, because a judicial nominee's ideology cannot be separated from his qualifications. Ideology is an inevitable part of a nominee's suitability for the federal bench. For their part, the Democrats are wrong to suggest that ideologically conservative nominees are "extremist." Generally speaking, Bush's nominees, even the very conservative ones, are mainstream participants in the contemporary debate over how judges should interpret the Constitution.

Twisting nominees' records to cast them as extremists is destructive and unnecessary. Every senator, Democrat and Republican alike, has a duty to assess a nominee's judicial values and methods against his or her standard for how judges should interpret the Constitution and federal law. Every senator has the right to reject a nominee for the simple reason that the senator believes the nominee's approach to legal issues to be importantly wrong-even if not extremist. Our legal culture has two factions. Basically, the "liberals" would support nominees who would preserve Roe vs. Wade and affirmative action, support a rigorous separation of church and state, be skeptical of the death penalty and believe the Constitution vests broad power in the federal government even at the expense of states' rights.

Legal "conservatives" hold diametrically opposite views. As a candidate, Bush promised that adherence to the conservative side of this debate-the side embodied by Justices Antonin Scalia and Clarence Thomas-would be an essential qualification for nomination to the federal bench. Taking the advice of conservative advisers, Bush has selected a core group of highly credentialed, conservative ideologues for appellate courts (such as the Sixth, 10th and D.C. circuits) that are closely divided between liberals and conservatives.

On these battleground circuits, a single new judge might tip the balance to the conservative side. Meanwhile, Bush assigned moderate nominees to circuits so overwhelmingly liberal or conservative that the views of one new appointee will have little impact. This strategy isn't inappropriate. In presidential elections, voters choose one candidate over another in part because they believe he'll nominate judges who share a vision of the Constitution and the proper judicial role.

By the same token, however, Democratic senators owe a duty to their constituents to refuse confirmation on the same overtly ideological grounds. If our divided government is any measure, the nation is evenly split between the liberal and conservative approaches to constitutional law. It thus is incumbent on Senate Democrats to ensure that the federal courts-the independent third branch of government-reflect the nation's ambivalence. This principle should apply even to the best of Bush's ideological nominees: Michael McConnell, Bush's selection for the U.S. Court of Appeals for the 10th Circuit (which covers Colorado, Kansas, New Mexico, Oklahoma, Utah and Wyoming). McConnell has distinguished himself as a constitutional scholar and has handled important constitutional-law cases. Those who know him, including liberals, say his temperament is suited to the job.

From a Democratic perspective, however, McConnell is profoundly wrong in his approach. First, he is (like Robert Bork) an adherent of the school of constitutional thought that asserts judges should interpret the Constitution according to the "original intent" of the framers. As shown in the Bork hearings, this approach is irremediably flawed. Divining the framers' intent is usually impossible (for one thing, the various framers were rarely of one mind). Moreover, experience with Antonin Scalia, Clarence Thomas and other originalist practitioners shows that their search for original intent is little more than a cloak conservative judges use to dress up their value-laden decisions in the neutral garb of historical inquiry.

Although McConnell may not be on record opposing Roe vs. Wade, his originalist approach makes his opposition a foregone conclusion. In addition, as an avowed fundamentalist Christian, he's arguably the legal world's leading advocate for lowering the wall between church and state. None of these views makes McConnell an extremist. He's more moderate than most conservatives on some issues. At bottom, though, McConnell follows a deeply troubled methodology to reach deeply troubling conclusions. That's grounds enough for rejecting him.

Democratic senators have the right-and even a duty-to force the administration into a compromise on judicial nominations so that the federal courts, now evenly balanced, will continue to reflect the close division in the electorate at large. Such a compromise might involve jointly identifying judicial moderates (a rare breed) or taking turns in choosing judges for the battleground circuit courts. In the meantime, Democrats should honestly and without apology have the courage of their convictions.

Sutton is Not The Saint Portrayed in 'Dispatch'

Andrew J. Imparato, President, American Association of People With Disabilities

Regarding the May 26 Dispatch editorial "Injustice," criticizing the " vexing problem" of disability advocates taking to the streets of Columbus to publicize their opposition to President Bush's nomination of former Ohio solicitor Jeffrey Sutton to the 6th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals, I would encourage the newspaper to consider the facts:

Sutton has been the lead attorney in a series of cases that have limited the ability of individuals to assert their civil rights in federal court.

He has not been simply a lawyer representing a client in one unpopular case, as the editorial suggested. Rather, he aggressively has pursued a prominent national role as the champion of a vocal and powerful minority of far-right legal theorists. Sutton and his allies have had increasing success in revisiting a states'-rights debate that the majority of Americans thought was decided during the Civil War and reinforced during the civil- rights struggles of the 1950s and 1960s.

Disability advocates and our allies have not sought to prevent Sutton from receiving a fair hearing before the Senate Judiciary Committee. Instead, we have sought to educate the senators and their constituents about Sutton's record.

Our ability to assert and enforce our civil rights is not simply "our favorite issue," as The Dispatch asserted.

For us, strong disability-rights enforcement is a matter of life with dignity and equal opportunity.

Gearing up to Vote on Court Nominees

Jonathan Ringel

Officially, the confirmation process for President George W. Bush's judicial nominees was stuck in limbo last week as Senate leaders haggled over the rules of engagement under the new Democratic majority. But beyond those negotiations, the judicial nomination process is moving ahead. Sen. Patrick Leahy, D-Vt., the new chairman of the Senate Judiciary Committee, says he will hold his first confirmation hearings about two weeks after new Majority Leader Tom Daschle, D-S.D., and Republicans come to an agreement. And an administration source says Bush is expected to name six to 10 new nominees this week, including several district court choices.

The way the Senate will treat judicial nominations is reportedly the sticking point in the secretive negotiations between Daschle and a team of five Republicans, including Sen. Orrin Hatch of Utah, the ranking minority member on the Judiciary Committee. Republicans appear to be seeking some assurances that Democrats will treat the appointees, and any potential Supreme Court nominee, with some degree of deference. Democrats, who will soon have a majority on the committee, may feel little pressure to offer anything more than their counterparts did during the Clinton administration.

Leahy has already said he will enforce the "blue slip" rule, by which the Judiciary Committee will not hold hearings or votes on nominees opposed by home-state senators. Republicans argue this rule gives individual senators too much power over presidential nominations. President Bush so far has made 17 nominations -- 15 to circuit courts of appeals and two to district courts. Around the country, 104 federal judgeships are vacant -- 33 on circuit courts and 71 on district courts. None of Bush's selections has been the subject of hearings before the Judiciary Committee.

When the committee was in its final days of Republican control, three nominees -- John Roberts Jr. for the D.C. Circuit and Sixth Circuit nominees Deborah Cook and Jeffrey Sutton -- had been scheduled to appear at a May 23 hearing. But their day before the panel was scuttled after vehement opposition by Democrats, who the next day won control of the Senate when Vermont Sen. James Jeffords announced he would defect from the GOP and become an independent. Democrats had argued that the committee should not hold hearings until the American Bar Association's standing committee on the federal judiciary had completed its reviews of nominees.

Now that things have changed, it's unlikely that Leahy would hold hearings on any nominee whose ABA rating is not completed. Leahy spokesman David Carle says the committee has received a few of the ratings so far, but is not yet prepared to make them public. While the ABA conducts an extensive background check, the reviews typically consist of only one sheet of paper describing the nominee as "well qualified," "qualified" or "not qualified." Carle also says the committee has yet to choose which of the nominees will be the first to have hearings.

The Judiciary Committee itself will undergo a change as a result of the power shift, with the likely scenario being one Democrat joining the 18-member committee to give the Democrats a one-vote majority. Leahy has spoken to former trial lawyer Sen. John Edwards of North Carolina about the slot, but no agreement has been reached. A spokeswoman for Sen. Zell Miller, a Georgia Democrat who has argued for Democrats to give great deference to President Bush's nominations, calls speculation that Miller was angling for a spot on judiciary "overblown." "He's perfectly happy with what he's got," said Miller press secretary Joan Kirchner, referring to Miller's current posts on the agriculture, banking and veterans' affairs committees.

Administration officials would not say who Bush will nominate next week, but it could be time for several previously reported candidates to have their day. Among those are U.S. Magistrate Judge William Steele of Mobile, Ala., for the Eleventh Circuit; Iowa U.S. District Judge Michael Melloy for the Eighth Circuit; and University of Utah professor Paul Cassell for a district court seat in that state. In March, Tennessee Republican Sens. Fred Thompson and Bill Frist made three recommendations for a single open seat on the Sixth Circuit. They are: Robert Echols, U.S. district chief judge in Nashville; Julia Gibbons, U.S. district chief judge in Memphis; and Lin Howard of Harwell Howard Hyne Gabbert & Manner in Nashville.

Montana may not be ground zero of the political warfare over judges, but it has gotten more than its share of attention from the Bush administration. If the Senate confirms litigator Sam Haddon and U.S. Magistrate Judge Richard Cebull, it's a good bet that folks with business before the federal court there will breathe a sigh of relief. The court has only three judges, and in the past year, Judges Jack Shanstrom and Charles Lovell took senior status, meaning they had significantly reduced their caseloads. That leaves Chief Judge Donald Molloy as the court's only active judge, He has had to focus on criminal cases in order to comply with speedy trial demands, while the civil docket has taken a back seat.

Fortunately for Molloy, Montana Sens. Conrad Burns, a Republican, and Max Baucus, a Democrat, were able to agree on recommendations for the posts. Such bipartisan agreement certainly helped speed the process at the White House and could do the same in the Senate. Meanwhile, the Montana federal court has been relying on help from nearby states. Lou Aleksich, the court clerk, says four federal judges have come to Montana to preside over civil trials this month.

Daschle Agrees to GOP Proposal for Vote on Supreme Court Nominees

Jesse J. Holland

Senators will decide whether President Bush's Supreme Court nominees get automatic confirmation votes from the full Senate without risking rejection by the Judiciary Committee, Senate Majority Leader Thomas Daschle said Tuesday.

Republicans asked for such treatment during negotiations over how to reorganize the newly Democrat-controlled Senate. The GOP is afraid that Democrats would block Bush's judicial nominations and has been looking for a way to ensure Bush's top nominees will at least make it to the floor. Daschle opposes any guarantees for Bush nominees. "We will provide them an opportunity for the vote, but I would hope the Senate would show its common sense and would vote against that particular proposal," said Daschle, D-S.D.

The GOP originally asked for guaranteed Senate votes on all Supreme Court and federal appellate court nominees and elimination of the secret veto process for some judicial nominations, but Daschle refused. The Republicans then modified their request to guaranteed Supreme Court votes only.

Democrats control the Senate by a 50-49 margin. Sen. Jim Jeffords of Vermont threw the chamber to the Democrats when he defected from the Republican Party to become the Senate's sole independent.

Daschle said he would ask his party to vote against the provision when the Senate votes. "I expect we will prevail," he said.

Calls to Republican senators involved in the negotiations with Daschle were not returned. A senior GOP leadership aide described Daschle's agreement to a vote on how Supreme Court nominees will be handled as a step in the right direction.

Daschle agreed to another Republican request: to make the senatorial "blue-slip" veto process public instead of private, as it has been in the past. "We certainly oppose private blue slips, and I'm prepared to incorporate the public blue-slip policy in the organizing resolution itself," Daschle said.

While the Senate Judiciary Committee has never in modern history kept a Supreme Court nominee from coming to a vote, the resolution would render the committee powerless to stop a future Supreme Court nominee no matter what the controlling party thinks.

"In essence, what their proposal would do is to create a 100-member judiciary committee, bypassing, if they wish, the Judiciary Committee itself. We're not prepared to do that," Daschle said. "We think that, for this institution, for careful consideration of the nominees themselves, we ought to continue to maintain the Senate practice of insisting that all nominees be considered and voted upon in the Judiciary Committee."

The provisions would only be binding on Congress until January 2003. It would also be negated if Republicans were to take back control of the chamber, which would force senators to vote on a new organizing resolution.

Daschle said Democrats would insist that changes become a permanent part of the Senate process if they are approved. "This ought not be something we just do for this Congress," he said.

The Senate will vote on the Supreme Court provision, and on reorganizing the chamber, before they leave for the Independence Day holiday, Daschle said.

The two sides also agreed that Democrats will gain a one-seat majority on each Senate committee, and the size of committees will be expanded to accommodate the one-seat Democratic edge. All Republicans will keep their committee assignments, and committee finances and space agreements negotiated at the beginning of the year will continue in effect as well.

The Senate will not work on any of Bush's nominees until after those votes, the majority leader said.

Bush has not nominated anyone for the Supreme Court because there are no openings. He has made several lower court nominations.

Despite Appearances, Confirmation Process for Judicial Nominees Makes Progress

Jonathan Ringel

WASHINGTON -- Officially, the confirmation process for President George W. Bush's judicial nominees was stuck in limbo last week as Senate leaders haggled over the rules of engagement under the new Democratic majority. But beyond those negotiations, the judicial nomination process is moving ahead.

Sen. Patrick Leahy, D-Vt., the new chairman of the Senate Judiciary Committee, says he will hold his first confirmation hearings about two weeks after new Majority Leader Tom Daschle, D-S.D., and Republicans come to an agreement. And an administration source says Bush is expected to name six to 10 new nominees soon, including several district court choices.

The way the Senate will treat judicial nominations is reportedly the sticking point in the secretive negotiations between Daschle and a team of five Republicans, including Sen. Orrin Hatch of Utah, the ranking minority member on the Judiciary committee. Republicans appear to be seeking some assurances that Democrats will treat the appointees, and any potential Supreme Court nominee, with some degree of deference. Democrats, who soon will have a majority on the committee, may feel little pressure to offer anything more than their counterparts did during the Clinton administration.

Leahy already has said he will enforce the "blue slip" rule, by which the Judiciary Committee will not hold hearings or votes on nominees opposed by home-state senators. Republicans argue this rule gives individual senators too much power over presidential nominations.

President Bush so far has made 17 nominations -- 15 to circuit courts of appeals and two to district courts. Around the country, 104 federal judgeships are vacant -- 33 on circuit courts and 71 on district courts.

None of Bush's selections have been the subject of hearings before the Judiciary Committee.

When the committee was in its final days of Republican control, three nominees -- John Roberts Jr. for the Washington, D.C., Circuit and 6th Circuit nominees Deborah Cook and Jeffrey Sutton -- had been scheduled to appear at a May 23 hearing. But the day before, the panel was scuttled after vehement opposition by Democrats, who the next day won control of the Senate when Vermont Sen. James Jeffords announced he would defect from the GOP and become an independent.

Democrats had argued that the committee should not hold hearings until the American Bar Association's Standing Committee on the Federal Judiciary had completed its reviews of nominees.

Now that things have changed, it's unlikely that Leahy would hold hearings on any nominee whose ABA rating is not completed. Leahy spokesman David Carle says the committee has received a few of the ratings so far, but is not yet prepared to make them public.

While the ABA conducts an extensive background check, the reviews typically consist of only one sheet of paper describing the nominee as "well-qualified," "qualified," or "not qualified."

Carle also says the committee had yet to choose which of the nominees will be the first to have hearings.

The Judiciary Committee itself will undergo a change as a result of the power shift, with the likely scenario being one Democrat joining the 18-member committee to give the Democrats a one-vote majority. Leahy has spoken to former trial lawyer Sen. John Edwards of North Carolina about the slot but no agreement has been reached.

A spokeswoman for Sen. Zell Miller, a Georgia Democrat who has argued for Democrats to give great deference to President Bush's nominations, calls speculation that Miller was angling for a spot on judiciary "overblown." "He's perfectly happy with what he's got," said Miller press secretary Joan Kirchner, referring to Miller's current posts on the agriculture, banking and veteran's affairs committees.

Administration officials would not say whom Bush will nominate, but it could be time for several previously reported candidates to have their day.

Among those are U.S. Magistrate Judge William Steele of Mobile, Ala., for the 11th Circuit, which includes Florida; Iowa U.S. District Judge Michael Melloy, for the 8th Circuit; and University of Utah professor Paul Cassell, for a district court seat in that state.

In Florida, Republican leaders have 70 lawyers to choose from -- including prominent names and relative unknowns -- in deciding whom to recommend to Bush for three federal judgeships and three U.S. attorney spots in the state.

The two vacant judgeships in the southern district drew the most applicants. But an open seat in the middle district attracted 19 candidates. The U.S. attorney spots in the northern, middle and southern districts drew 10, nine and eight applicants, respectively. Many applicants hedged their bets by applying for more than one position.

Gov. Jeb Bush, Rep. E. Clay Shaw Jr., R-Fla., and Rep. C.W. Young, R-Fla., will pick the finalists to recommend to the White House.

Back in Familiar Role, ABA Rates 6 Judicial Nominees

Jonathan Ringel

Six of President George W. Bush's nominees for the federal appeals courts have received "qualified" or "well qualified" ratings from the American Bar Association's standing committee on the federal judiciary. These are the first ratings to come from the ABA committee since President George W. Bush in March kicked the group out of its 48-year role prescreening potential judicial nominees for the White House.

The ABA saw its stock rise again with the switch to Democratic control of the Senate, and Senate Judiciary Chairman Patrick Leahy, D-Vt., has promised to consider the evaluations before commencing hearings on any individual nominee. The panel has so far given the highest ratings to three sitting district judges seeking elevation to their appeals courts, according to documents released by the Senate Judiciary Committee and other sources. The committee unanimously gave a "well qualified" rating to Judge Barrington Parker Jr. of the federal trial court in New York, nominated for a seat on the Second Circuit U.S. Court of Appeals. Parker, an African-American, was nominated to the district court in 1994 by then-President Bill Clinton.

A majority of the ABA panel gave Judge Edith Brown Clement of the federal trial court in New Orleans, nominated for the Fifth Circuit, a "well qualified" rating. A minority of the panel rated Clement "qualified," according to the documents, and one unidentified member of the panel abstained from voting. Clement was nominated to the trial court in 1991 by then-President George Bush.

A nominee to the Fourth Circuit, Judge Dennis Shedd of the federal trial court in Columbia, S.C., also received a majority "well qualified," minority " qualified" rating, according to a source. When Bush nominated him to his current seat in 1990, Shedd, a former staffer to Sen. Strom Thurmond, R-S.C., had received a mixed "qualified/not qualified" ABA rating, according to a press account from the time. Jeffrey Sutton, a Sixth Circuit nominee, received a majority "qualified," minority "well qualified" rating. Sutton, a partner in the Columbus, Ohio, office of Jones, Day, Reavis & Pogue, has successfully argued several Supreme Court cases on behalf of litigants challenging acts of Congress as overreaching, including parts of the Violence Against Women Act and the Americans With Disabilities Act.

Ohio Supreme Court Justice Deborah Cook, also named to the Sixth Circuit, was unanimously rated "qualified." Cook, on the state high court for six years, was strongly backed in her 2000 re-election race by the Ohio business community, but opposed by African-American and plaintiffs lawyer groups. The ABA panel was also unanimous in calling Fourth Circuit Judge Roger Gregory "qualified." Gregory was a Richmond litigator until late last year, when President Clinton, in a controversial move, named him to the Fourth Circuit while Congress was out of session. Bush's decision to renominate Gregory, who is the first African-American judge on the Fourth Circuit, was seen as an attempt to mollify Democrats poised to block his nominees. A senior Bush administration official said the ratings "reaffirm the choice of these candidates as ones of high competence and integrity."

The ABA is expected to issue ratings shortly on the five other judicial nominees the president announced in May, including appellate advocates Miguel Estrada and John Roberts Jr. for the D.C. Circuit; North Carolina federal Judge Terrence Boyle for the Fourth Circuit; Texas high court Justice Priscilla Owen for the Fifth Circuit; and University of Utah law professor Michael McConnell for the 10th Circuit. President Bush has since nominated five others to circuit court posts, and three to district court posts. He announced Monday that he intends to nominate Magistrate Judge Terry Wooten to the U.S. district court in South Carolina.

The ABA panel conducts dozens of interviews with lawyers, judges and others regarding each nominee, evaluates the nominees' qualifications with regard to integrity, professional competence and judicial temperament, and hands out one of three ratings: "well qualified," "qualified," and "not qualified." The committee consists of one member from each of 12 federal judicial circuits, two from the huge Ninth Circuit and a chairwoman, Patricia Hynes of Milberg, Weiss, Bershad, Hynes & Lerach. Ever since the ABA committee gave mixed ratings to Republican Supreme Court nominees Robert Bork (the majority found him "well qualified" while the minority said he was "not qualified") and Clarence Thomas (the majority said " qualified," the minority "not qualified"), the committee has come under strong criticism from conservatives.

In March, the Bush administration removed the group from its formal role. White House Counsel Alberto Gonzales said at the time that the president did not want to give the ABA a

"preferential" role above other groups that could weigh in on the judiciary. Liberal groups decried the decision for removing an important peer review from the process and said it was a sign that Bush was trying to ease the way to push the judiciary to the right. Leahy would not comment on individual nominees Monday, according to a spokesman. Leahy has said he expects to hold hearings on nominees about two weeks after the Senate leadership completes reorganization negotiations.

Bush Wants Cassell as Judge

Lee Davidson

WASHINGTON -- President Bush has nominated University of Utah law professor Paul G. Cassell to become a judge in the U.S. District Court for Utah.

If confirmed by the Senate, Cassell would replace retired Judge David Sam.

Cassell, who was nominated Tuesday, is considered an expert on victims rights. He represented relatives of victims of the Oklahoma City bombing who wanted to attend the trial of Timothy McVeigh but had been excluded by a judge's order.

While he initially lost the case seeking to allow them to attend, he turned to Congress and helped push through a victims-rights bill in two weeks that forced the judge to allow their attendance.

"The judicial system would be a much better place if we had more Paul Cassells and Judge (Richard) Matschs (who refused to block McVeigh's execution)," said Marsha Kight, with the National Organization for Victims Assistance. Her daughter, Frankie Merrell, was killed in the Oklahoma City bombing.

"He'll make an excellent judge," she said, praising Cassell's representation of her and other relatives of Oklahoma City bombing victims.

Calls to Cassell and the law school for comment on his nomination were not immediately returned.

Cassell also argued but lost a high-profile case before the Supreme Court seeking to allow some confessions to stand even if police failed to give "Miranda" warnings telling those interrogated that they have the right to remain silent.

Cassell, 41, has been a professor of law at the University of Utah since 1992.

He was an assistant U.S. attorney in the Eastern District of Virginia from 1988-91, and was an associate deputy U.S. attorney general from 1986-88.

Cassell was a law clerk for Warren E. Burger, former chief justice of the United States, from 1985-86. He was also a clerk for Antonin Scalia (now a U.S. Supreme Court justice) when he was a judge on the U.S. District Court of Appeals in Washington, D.C.

Cassell received his law degree from Stanford University in 1984, and received his bachelor's degree there in 1979.

He was admitted to the bar in Pennsylvania in 1986 and to the Utah bar in 1992.

Cassell is the second University of Utah law professor to be nominated by Bush for a judgeship. Michael W. McConnell was nominated to the Denver-based 10th Circuit Court of Appeals. His nomination is also pending before the Senate Judiciary Committee.

Utah Law Professor Nominated for Federal Bench

Paul Foy

President Bush has nominated University of Utah law professor Paul Cassell to replace U.S. District Court Judge David Sam.

Cassell, 42, is a conservative legal scholar who has criticized the aggressive federal prosecution of Salt Lake's Olympic bid leaders.

He also is a victims' rights advocate who argued before the U.S. Supreme Court last year that some criminal confessions should stand even when police fail to give suspects the Miranda warning on their right to remain silent. The court disagreed.

Cassell was an assistant U.S. attorney in the Eastern District of Virginia from 1988-91, and associate deputy U.S. attorney general from 1986-88.

He was sponsored by Sen. Orrin Hatch, R-Utah, for the federal bench and nominated by President Bush on Tuesday.

"It's obviously a great opportunity to serve on the bench and I'm honored the president has put my name forward," Cassell said Wednesday in San Diego, Calif., where he was vacationing with his wife and three children.

If confirmed by the U.S. Senate, Cassell would take on the full-time vacancy opened in Utah in late 1999 when Sam went on senior, semiretired status. Sam will continue to handle some cases and has been assigned to preside over the Olympic bribery trial of Salt Lake bid chief Tom Welch and his deputy, Dave Johnson. The trial is set to begin July 16.

Cassell's nomination to the bench silenced his often provocative critique of the government's case. He was no apologist for Welch and Johnson, but Cassell argued the U.S. Justice Department devised elaborate conspiracy, fraud and racketeering theories when simpler charges would suffice.

Welch and Johnson were indicted by a federal grand jury on charges of conspiring over a decade to bribe the International Olympic Committee by plying its members with $1 million in cash, scholarships, travel, medical care and excessive gifts. The defendants maintain they did nothing criminally wrong or different from other bid cities.

Cassell doesn't expect to handle any aspect of the Olympic case. He would take one of five full-time positions at the U.S. District Court for Utah, which has been understaffed for a year. Each judge handles about 100 criminal and 300 civil cases a year.

Sam, 67, handles about half of the usual caseload of full-time judges as a semi-retired judge.

Cassell represented families of victims of the Oklahoma City bombing who were initially barred from attending the trial of Timothy McVeigh, who was executed June 11.

He helped usher a victims' rights bill through Congress that forced the judge in the McVeigh case to make room for the victims' relatives at trial.

"He'll make an excellent judge," Marsha Kight, whose daughter was killed in the blast, told the Deseret News.

Cassell was a law clerk for former Supreme Court Chief Justice Warren E. Burger from 1985-86. He served as clerk to Antonin Scalia, now a Supreme Court justice, when Scalia was on the U.S. District Court of Appeals in Washington, D.C.

Cassell received bachelor's and law degrees from Stanford University and was admitted to the Pennsylvania bar in 1986 and the Utah bar in 1992.

He is the second University of Utah law professor to be nominated by Bush for a judgeship. Michael W. McConnell's nomination to the Denver-based 10th Circuit Court of Appeals is pending before the Senate Judiciary Committee.

Ready to Rumble

Byron York

In coming weeks, Democrats on the Senate Judiciary Committee plan to hold a series of hearings which they say will help clarify the issues involved in the judicial-confirmation process - and which Republicans believe will serve to establish a legal and political basis for rejecting George W. Bush's nominees for federal judgeships.

Next Tuesday, New York Democrat Charles Schumer, the new chairman of the Subcommittee on Administrative Oversight and the Courts, will hold a hearing entitled, "Should Ideology Matter? Judicial Nominations 2001." Next month, according to Senate sources, committee chairman Patrick Leahy will hold hearings to discuss the Rehnquist Court, federal jurisprudence, and conservative judicial activism.

Republicans believe the hearings will amount to a one-two punch against Bush's nominees. The Schumer session will establish that it is acceptable to oppose nominees solely on ideological grounds, and the Leahy hearing will suggest that Bush's nominees hold views that are dangerously out of touch with those of most Americans. The end result will be the conclusion that Democrats are justified in voting against the president's nominees, even if they seem well-qualified to hold office.

Democrats deny that there is any overarching strategy at work. "Basically, the senator wants to take a look at how we should view the process for confirming judges," says Schumer spokesman Bradley Tusk. "What role should ideology play? I think there's some confusion on how we should deal with the issue."

Nevertheless, the witness lists for the hearings are likely to be tilted in favor of the emerging Democratic consensus that senators can legitimately vote against judges on the basis of ideology alone. In the past, senators who disagreed with a nominee's judicial philosophy have often been forced to search for a disqualifying flaw on which they could base their opposition, while steadfastly maintaining that ideology had nothing to do with it.

For example, in the 1987 fight over the Supreme Court nomination of Robert Bork, wrote the Washington Post's E.J. Dionne in an influential recent column, "Liberals couldn't simply oppose Bork. To block him, they had to trash him." Now, Dionne continued, Democrats are "no longer shilly-shallying. They're saying, right from the start, that they'll oppose judicial nominees on philosophical grounds alone."

Republicans have gotten the message. "They're laying the groundwork," one GOP aide says of the Democrats' plans. "They're trying to paint all of our judges as right-wing extremists who are here to turn back the clock on civil rights. To be mainstream and moderate, therefore, they have to stop them."

Meanwhile, as Schumer and Leahy plan their hearings, the work of actually confirming the president's nominees has ground to a halt. No hearings have been scheduled for the confirmation of any of the nearly two-dozen nominees so far announced by the White House.

Organizing Talks Go On, But Daschle Readies For Showdown

Senate Majority Leader Daschle could bring up a new organizational resolution for the Senate as early as this week--a move that could allow committees to function normally, while putting an end to weeks of contentious negotiations. Nevertheless, Daschle and a team of GOP negotiators continued to exchange communications Tuesday--a sign that a chance remained for the two sides to broker a final deal and avoid a partisan fight on the Senate floor.

Daschle told reporters that he would bring up a resolution this week that reflects areas on which Republicans and Democrats can agree, while allowing Republicans to offer amendments to address their concerns about moving judicial nominees. But a team of GOP negotiators met in Minority Leader Lott's office Tuesday evening to prepare yet another Republican offer for Daschle.

"I think we're sending him something that will be worthy of consideration," said Sen. Pete Domenici, R-N.M. Said Sen. Phil Gramm, R-Texas; "The whole thing might be avoided. We might have an agreement." Gramm downplayed the idea of a GOP filibuster to block an organizing resolution.

Daschle addressed reporters after meeting with his Democratic colleagues to describe an earlier offer from the GOP negotiating team on the organizing resolution. He said the Democratic Caucus was "disappointed" in the GOP offer, adding, "My five Republican colleagues have chosen to terminate the negotiations."

Daschle said he had hoped to avoid a partisan floor fight over the organizing resolution. Nevertheless, allowing a vote on the GOP proposals would give Republicans something they had been seeking in talks with Daschle last week.

Daschle rejected GOP demands for a "guarantee" that judicial nominations would come to a vote, saying such an approach "undermines" the Senate.

"What they want is a 100-member Judiciary Committee, [and] we're not prepared to do that," Daschle said.

Other Democrats echoed that sentiment at the Tuesday meeting of their Caucus.

"I don't know of a self-respecting member of a committee who would tolerate bypassing their committee," said Sen. Christopher Dodd, D-Conn. Daschle said he had asked Lott to offer specific proposals on the two issues Republicans raised, and he expected Democrats had the votes to head off the GOP proposal. "My guess is it would be pretty much a party-line vote," said a Democratic aide.

Daschle said Democrats were willing to accept a GOP proposal to make public the "blue slip" process--by which a single senator can block action on a judicial nominee. He noted that Sen. Richard Durbin, D-Ill., proposed such a move in 1997, only to draw opposition from then-Judiciary Chairman Hatch.

"I just hope they would support this for future Congresses, not just this Congress," Daschle said of Republicans. The Democratic aide said Republicans "made clear" that they would not filibuster the organizing resolution if they received votes on their proposals. Dodd said if Republicans decided to hold up the Senate's business over the organizing resolution, "you open yourself up to looking terribly petty."

Another Democratic aide said preparations were under way for Majority Whip Reid to move into the choice office space now occupied by Minority Whip Nickles. Republicans and Democrats have said they generally agree on issues of staff, office space and a one-seat Democratic majority on committees, all of which are also in the organizing resolution.

The negotiations over Senate organization took place behind the scenes as Daschle struggled to bring managed care legislation to the floor despite GOP objections (see related article, page 12).

The Senate reached a unanimous consent agreement late Tuesday to schedule a vote on a motion to proceed to the bill Thursday morning. Daschle had indicated earlier in the day that he would file a cloture motion on the bill if a UC could not be reached. Daschle said it was important for the Senate to complete managed care legislation before the July Fourth recess, while also mentioning an FY01 defense supplemental appropriations bill--in order to leave the rest of July available to move appropriations bills.

Senate Republicans had objected to a Democratic motion to proceed to the patients' rights bill, and Daschle indicated he was prepared to file a cloture motion Tuesday that would lead to a cloture vote Thursday.

Amid signs of GOP foot-dragging, Daschle also threatened to cut into the precious July Fourth recess to complete action on the managed care bill. "I'll see you for the fireworks on the Fourth," Daschle told reporters. Republicans warned they were in no hurry to rush through that measure.

"Washington, D.C., is a very interesting place on July Fourth," said Nickles, who added, "Whether we're in for a couple of days [during the planned break] is irrelevant." But Nickles stressed that Republicans would do battle over the substance of the bill and had "no intention of filibustering this bill."

Still, Lott has not ruled out the possibility of a filibuster to block the measure. Republicans objected to a motion to proceed to the bill, on the grounds that they had not been given a chance to review changes made to the legislation last week.

Sen. Judd Gregg, R-N.H., said Daschle had been "a bit autocratic" in his decision to bring up the bill, adding, "I think we need a couple of days to talk about what the bill is."

Daschle laughed off GOP charges that the legislation had been secretly rewritten, saying he was bringing up the same bill listed on the Senate calendar.

Daschle and Reid stressed that the Senate would work through the July Fourth recess if necessary to complete work on the patients' rights bill. But, under those circumstances, Daschle said the chamber would be off July Fourth for the day.

Picking Judges: Democrats Should Stand Their Ground
Edward Lazarus

With the power shift on Capitol Hill, the issue of how the Senate should approach President Bush's judicial nominations has moved to center stage. Both sides already have staked out positions on the substantive question of what standards senators should use in evaluating Bush's picks for the federal bench.

Echoing the theme of Democrats when Clinton's nominees were pending, Republicans now argue that the Senate should confirm all "qualified" nominees (based on their credentials) regardless of ideology. Meanwhile, Democrats, borrowing the GOP tune of the past eight years, respond that the Senate has an obligation to reject ideological "extremists."

Both responses are confused and inadequate. The GOP approach is wrongheaded, because a judicial nominee's ideology cannot be separated from his qualifications. On the contrary, ideology is an inevitable part of a nominee's suitability for the federal bench.

For their part, the Democrats are wrong to suggest that ideologically conservative nominees are "extremist." Generally speaking, Bush's nominees, even the very conservative ones, are mainstream participants in the contemporary debate over how judges should interpret the Constitution.

Twisting the record of nominees in order to cast them as extremists is both destructive and unnecessary. Every senator, Democrat and Republican alike, has a duty to assess a nominee's judicial values and methods against his or her own standard for how judges should interpret the Constitution and federal law. And every senator has the right to reject a nominee for the simple reason that the senator believes the nominee's approach to legal issues to be importantly wrong -- even if not extremist.

Our legal culture is riven into two factions. Basically, the "liberals" would preserve Roe v. Wade and affirmative action, support a rigorous separation of church and state, are skeptical of the death penalty, and believe that the Constitution vests broad power in the federal government even at the expense of states' rights. Legal "conservatives" hold diametrically opposite views.

As a candidate, Bush promised that adherence to the conservative side of this debate – the side embodied by Justices Antonin Scalia and Clarence Thomas -- would be an essential qualification for nomination to the federal bench. As president, Bush has redeemed this promise.

Taking the advice of very conservative advisers, Bush has selected a core group of highly credentialed, conservative ideologues for placement on those appellate courts (such as the 6th, 10th and D.C. circuits) that are closely divided between liberals and conservatives. On these battleground circuits, a single new judge might tip the political balance of an appellate court to the conservative side. Meanwhile, Bush carefully assigned his more moderate nominees to circuits that are so overwhelmingly liberal or conservative that the views of one new appointee will have little impact.

This clever strategy is not inappropriate. In presidential elections, voters choose one candidate over another in part because they believe he will nominate judges who share a certain vision of the Constitution and the proper judicial role. American history is replete with examples of presidents seeking to perpetuate their legacies by filling the judiciary with like-minded judges.

By the same token, however, Democratic senators owe a duty to their constituents to refuse confirmation on the same overtly ideological grounds. If our divided government is any measure, the nation as a whole is evenly split between the liberal and conservative approaches to constitutional law. And it thus is incumbent on Senate Democrats to ensure that the federal courts -- the independent third branch of government -- reflect the nation's profound ambivalence.

This principle should apply to even the best of Bush's ideological nominees -- at the moment, Michael McConnell, Bush's selection for the U.S. Court of Appeals for the 10th Circuit (which presides over federal cases in Colorado, Kansas, New Mexico, Oklahoma, Utah and Wyoming).

McConnell's credentials are impressive. He has distinguished himself as a constitutional law scholar and has handled numerous important constitutional law cases. Those who know him, including liberals, say his temperament is suited to being a judge.

But from a Democratic perspective, McConnell is also profoundly wrong in his approach to the Constitution. First, he is (like Robert Bork) an adherent of the school of constitutional thought that asserts judges should interpret the Constitution according to the "original intent" of the Framers.

As was shown in the Bork hearings, this approach is irremediably flawed. Divining the Framers' intent is usually impossible (for one thing, the various Framers were rarely of one mind). Moreover, experience with Scalia, Thomas and other originalist practitioners shows that their search for original intent is little more than a cloak conservative judges use to dress up their value-laden decisions in the neutral garb of historical inquiry.

On specific issues, although McConnell may not be on record opposing Roe v. Wade, his originalist approach is antithetical to Roe and makes his opposition a foregone conclusion. McConnell is very much on record, moreover, on another hot-button issue: An avowed fundamentalist Christian, he is arguably the legal world's leading advocate for lowering the wall of separation between church and state.

None of these views -- which many conservatives share -- makes McConnell an extremist. Indeed, McConnell is more moderate than most conservatives on some issues. At bottom, though, McConnell follows a deeply troubled methodology to reach deeply troubling conclusions. And that is grounds enough for rejecting him.

In short, Democratic senators have the right -- and even a duty -- to force the administration into a compromise on judicial nominations so that the federal courts, now evenly balanced, will continue to reflect the close division in the electorate at large. Such a compromise might involve jointly identifying judicial moderates (a rare breed) or taking turns in choosing judges for the battleground circuit courts. But in the meantime, Democrats should honestly and without apology have the courage of their convictions. They should just say no. The writer is author of "Closed Chambers: The Rise, Fall, and Future of the Modern Supreme Court."

Doing Business in the Senate

Editorial

The organizing process undertaken by the Senate every two years usually occurs with little fuss. But with a newly constituted Senate now in Democratic control, what used to be a routine housekeeping chore has become a focus of partisan impasse. Republicans are demanding a ban on a parliamentary tactic employed in the past to block some judicial nominations, and they are seeking guarantees that all Supreme Court nominations will be brought to the Senate floor, even if they are rejected in committee. This is a case that can be resolved with some good will. Democrats should give in on one but not both the Republican requests.

The irony, not to say audacity, of the Republican demands is striking. For the six years that Republicans controlled the Senate, they routinely obstructed President Bill Clinton's judicial nominations, often refusing even to hold hearings or a vote in the Judiciary Committee. This page deplored such tactics, so the Democrats' pledge to hold hearings and votes in committee is most welcome. Another tactic used by the Republicans was the so-called "blue slip," in which a senator from the home state of a judicial nominee could anonymously block that nominee from being considered. Despite using that tactic in the past, Republicans are now demanding that any senator using the blue slip be identified. The demand is no doubt galling to Democrats, but they should nevertheless accept it.
Senators who block a nomination from their home state should have the courage to do so publicly.

A separate demand by the Republicans is less worthy of approval. They are asking for a change in Senate rules that would require any nomination for the Supreme Court to be sent to the full Senate even if it is rejected in committee. The fact is that, except for one historical oddity when there was a nomination for a seat that was not yet vacant, neither Republicans nor Democrats can find a case in which a Supreme Court nomination was not submitted to the full Senate. The nominations for Supreme Court of Robert Bork and Clarence Thomas were both voted on by the Senate, even though Mr. Bork was rejected by a majority in committee and Judge Thomas got a tie vote.

Tom Daschle, the Senate majority leader, has promised that the Democrats will give full and fair consideration to all judicial nominations. Citing the Bork and Thomas precedents, he has indicated that he fully expects Supreme Court nominations to be treated as in the past.

Senate rules have for many decades empowered committees to vet nominations and decide whether to approve them. Changing the rules now would undermine the power of the committee at just the time when its new chairman, Patrick Leahy of Vermont, has promised to process the nominations in an evenhanded, open fashion. The Republicans should take him at his word and not try to force an artificial arrangement just because they fear the Democrats will behave as badly as the Republicans did under President Clinton. Above all, Republicans should not be trying to block the Senate from proceeding with its business by demanding arbitrary new rules of the Democrats.

Julie Samuels

As Democrats and Republicans work out a new power-sharing deal in the Senate, the issue of judicial nominees remains a major point of contention. With Democrats controlling the agenda, will President Bush's nominees even get confirmation hearings? Will the Republicans make committee assignments if they don't?

National Journal.com's Julie Samuels spoke with Kent Markus, former counselor to Clinton Attorney General Janet Reno and a onetime judicial nominee himself, about the process, the lack of judges on today's federal bench and how this might all play out in the Democratic-led Senate.

Q. Briefly walk me through the process of your nomination and the experience you had as an example of how the process works -- or maybe doesn't always work. Well, mine was a nomination for a federal appellate court, and I think already it's worth mentioning that the process is quite radically different for the appellate courts as compared with the district courts. Because the appellate court selections are primarily managed, controlled, decided by the White House and the Justice Department, mostly the White House, whereas the district court appointments are pretty much decided by local officials in the state in which the opening exists, usually the United States senators....And so, because we were talking about an appellate court position, mine was mostly a conversation that was taking place among Washington folk. I learned -- through a friend -- that [Judge] Dave Nelson on the 6th Circuit had sent a letter in to the Justice Department indicating an intention some months later to take senior status. That triggered the whole discussion. This was in the mid- to late summer of 1999. The friend at Justice called and said, "You know, we've got this letter, are you interested in the seat?" And I said, "Yes, I'm very interested in the seat."

That began a process of trying to persuade various critical decision makers that I was the right person to be nominated for that seat. I think to the extent that anyone suggests that this is a process -- for any of these court positions -- that you get a call one day from some official calling you to public service because they've researched the backgrounds of all conceivable candidates and determined that you are by far the most worthy isn't telling you the truth. I mean, I don't know anybody who's been involved in any of these conversations that doesn't engage, even though it may be sort of an awkward word to use in this context, in something resembling a campaign to obtain one of these appointments. I think people like to pretend it's substantially more gentile than that, but it isn't. So, I undertook efforts to have various people communicate simultaneously with both the White House and Justice Department and especially key decision makers there that I would be a good nominee for the spot. And these were all people that knew me. I had worked as Attorney General [Janet] Reno's counselor at the Justice Department -- the highest-ranking staff-adviser to the attorney general, so I knew almost everybody who was being communicated with, and yet it still was a process you have to go through to persuade them that, among other conceivable nominees, you're the right one.

At the same time, I was also trying to make sure that, because I had two United States senators from the opposite political party here in Ohio, that were I able to persuade the White House that this was the way to go, that the United States senators were not going to be opposed to my selection. And so there was a similar effort going with Senator [George] Voinovich and even more particularly Senator [Mike] DeWine, since he was senior senator from Ohio and on the Judiciary Committee....And then... nothing happened for a while. And then there was delay and delay and delay, and I would talk to friends who were involved in the weekly meetings at the White House -- "Did the seat come up for discussion this week?"; "No, we didn't get to it, we didn't talk about it"; "Oh, it got mentioned and so-and-so said they heard from so-and-so about you" -- and I sort of would get little bits and scraps and pieces and, you know, my reaction was, "Jeez, I'm peculiarly well-connected, as compared to many people going through this, and still, I can only get little bits and scraps and pieces of information about what's going on and is there really a delay for some substantial reason, that there's a concern about whether I'm the right nominee and they're looking at others, or is it just that other matters are taking a higher priority, or what's going on?"

Just as magically, at some point it finally breaks, and that took until about December. And it was in, if I recall, the third week of December that I finally got the call from the White House saying, "We intend to proceed with your nomination, assuming that everything's OK."

At that point you then begin a much more cumbersome process where you are provided an extraordinary set of forms and questionnaires -- one for the White House, one for the FBI, one for the Justice Department, one for the Senate and Judiciary Committee and one for the administrative office of the courts.... The moment they say "go," in terms of putting together the forms and submitting them, the hurry-up-and-wait process then becomes another hurry-up process because they then, once they've made the decision, want you to get everything in as quickly as you possibly can so that it can be scrutinized and a final determination can be made as to whether you are in fact going to be nominated or whether all these materials and background checks will reveal some problem....

So, you're going nuts trying to put all of this together and get it in. Simultaneously, as soon as you get it in, not only does it trigger the White House own internal evaluation of everything and the FBI check to make sure you're not a drug dealer or you're not beating your spouse or whatever, but that the [American Bar Association] check then began. And they have their own whole process, where they not only interview you, but they interviewed a wide range of people in your legal community and others about you and your integrity and your experience and your knowledge of the law and all those kind of things, for their rating process.... So, you go through with that whole process -- and that all went on from about the third week in December -- in what in this context was considered very speedy – to a nomination on February 9....

From that point, the goal was obviously to seek and obtain a hearing and get a positive confirmation vote and then get a vote of the full Senate with respect to confirmation. One of the critical intermediary steps to be getting such a hearing was, and to this day still remains much in the news, the blue slips returned from your two home-state senators.

I had two Republican senators, and the White House had expressed some skepticism about whether I was going to be able to get two blue slips returned, and I think, in the end, I was the only court of appeals nominee in the country who had blue slips returned by two home-state Republican senators, both saying: "We have no objection to this nominee. You can go ahead and hold hearings if you chose to." But, again, that took time and persuasion and encouragement and there were editorials in the newspapers across the state encouraging the senators to not let this position remain open... and finally Senators Voinovich and DeWine both returned their blue slips to [then Senate Judiciary Committee] Chairman [Orrin] Hatch, [R-Utah], which was yet another critical hurdle covered.... Then it was a whole lobbying process of -- in the election year and in the context in which there was clearly a desire by many to simply say: " Look, we're just not going to confirm people this year, especially court of appeals nominees. Let's hold these seats open, see if we win the White House, and if we do, we get to fill those seats rather than the other guys."

And, in the end, that's exactly what happened to me and lots and lots of other people, and it wasn't even -- I think, to my knowledge -- anything that was focused on any substantial way on me personally. It was just a relatively across-the-board decision among the majority in the Senate... and the strategy paid off.

Q. What do you think about the blue-slip process? A. I don't think it's a good process, and I am one of the people who was not a victim of it. There were others like me who were awaiting confirmation hearings, [and] that was the hurdle they couldn't get across.... I actually had hoped, and the White House had hoped, that being in the somewhat extraordinary position of having two Republican senators return blue slips for a Democratic nominee, might have been enough to break through. And it even might have been something that Hatch could have used as an excuse to say, "Look, I'm not a terrible bad guy, here's a guy who got blue slips returned by his two Republican senators and we moved and proceeded to a hearing on him." That still didn't do it for me.

Even though I wasn't the victim of the process, at least at that point, I just think that it's an inappropriate prerogative, and that's all it is. It's a prerogative that's afforded the individual senators, and I think that I'd rather have... a more deliberative process where we look at candidates, we make a decision, and vote them up or down. I think the big unfortunate part is I think the reason there's such a reluctance to give up that prerogative is that it's substantially politically easier to simply to have nothing happen than to vote against.

Q. It sounded like the longest delay you faced was from the end of September to December. I was curious as to where you think these delays tend to come from.
A. I think they come from everywhere. I think they come -- in terms of the White House decision making -- I do think they come primarily from a combination of managing competing objectives and competing interests and competing candidates and all of that playing out in the decision making. And the general state of affairs that I experienced at high levels of the Justice Department and that I saw at high levels of the White House is you never have time to do all the things you're supposed to be doing.

And so even things that are objectively reasonably important matters suddenly become not terribly important compared to other things that are much more important.... I think when you combine that bureaucratic aspect to it with the political aspect of having to decide among competing candidates, those combine in a nefarious way to result in a delay...

Q. In a broader sense, how do you think the process changed after the 1987 Robert Bork hearings, if it did change at all?

A. I think in general that was a contributor to a sense of a need for tit-for-tat paybacks for actual and perceived slights by both parties. I think it's actually consistent with changes in the Congress that have absolutely nothing to do with nominations. My perception, throughout the '90s, is that Congress became a substantially less civil place, that there was substantially less accommodation that took place among members.... It became a substantially more partisan place. It became a meaner place. I think that was just one aspect and one manifestation of it that had an impact, particularly on nominees.

Q. Do you personally think that a nominee who might be seen as too idealistic is qualified to sit on a federal bench?

A. Depends on what you mean by "too idealistic." ... I think quite clearly being idealistic alone is not disqualifying. I think the critical question in addition to standard qualifying questions... is "What is your view of the role of a judge?" You can be as ideological as you want to be if you don't have any intent or desire to try to foist your own ideological perspective upon the system through your position as a judge. That is, whatever your privately-held views are, so what? -- if you don't seek to impose those views from the bench.... I am not particularly enamored with judges who substantially invade the purview of the legislative branch, and that's something that is loosely referred to as being activist. Unfortunately, I think that term has become very politically charged and one of those terms that's come to mean whatever anybody wants it to mean. But, I think historically, I think it's how much restraint the judge demonstrates vis-à-vis the operations of the other branches, and I think that I'm very uncomfortable with the amount of activism -- with the amount of invasion of the legislative and executive branches -- we're seeing on the judiciary right now.... If someone is highly ideological but also has a very limited and constricted view of the role of judge, I don't have a problem with that person. I have a problem with them if they are highly ideological, and they're on a mission to effectuate that ideology once they get on the bench.

Q. As far as ABA ratings go, I'd like to talk about those for a second because, especially since the power switch -- when Bush first came into office, he said "we aren't going to use them," and then the Democrats came into the majority, and they said, "well, now we are..."

A. And I think even before the power switch the Democrats had said, "you may not be going to use them, but we still want them...." And they had made pretty clear that they were going to wait for an ABA recommendation before they were going to be willing to schedule hearings with regards to candidates who had been nominated. So that, even before the power switch, the effect would have been that the White House would not have had the advantage of information about the ABA's views and ratings before finalizing the nomination decision. They would have finalized their nomination decision and then learned about what the ABA's view is, which I thought was a little risky on their behalf.

That's if they cared one wit about what the ABA said, which apparently they didn't. And so, I think that this power switch has only heightened that a little bit more, which has given Democrats the ability to say: "Look, we really mean that. We're not proceeding with the nominations until we know what the ABA says. And now we control the committee schedule, and we're going to wait for that."

Q. So the role that they're going to play has not changed?

A. I think it's only changed in... timing. It no longer is being used as an element of the White House decision making as to whether to proceed with a contemplated nomination. Instead, the recommendation will come out after the White House decides to make a nomination and will be used primarily in the context of making confirmation decisions.

Q. Right now, there's more than 100 judicial vacancies in the federal court system, which is the most since 1997. How serious of a problem is that?

A. There's a serious problem with respect to the delay, and, in the most cliché of ways, you really have a "justice delayed is justice denied" phenomenon going on. Even while my nomination was pending for the 6th Circuit, and that's now eight, nine months ago when I was involved with these conversations still, the 6th Circuit was a great example. It had become because of the number of vacancies that existed then, the slowest circuit in the country -- the time of argument to the time of decision, with cases averaging in excess of two years to get a decision out of the appeals court. That's crazy. And since that time, there are additional vacancies on the 6th Circuit.

So the suggestions that we can stand to have continuing delays in the fillings of these positions I think is wrong. And I think that the Democrats on the Judiciary Committee are in an awkward position.... They might like to engage in more tit-for-tat; they're angry about what was done to some of the nominees in the Clinton administration. They also full-well recognize that it is just not good for the country and for the system to continue to delay in filling these positions.

Q. As far as the power shift goes, how do you see that affecting the nominating process?

A. I think it's undeniable that it's going to slow it down. I hope that it does not go to a stall, a delay, a blockage. Again, I just think that's wrong. And maybe I'm more acutely cognizant of that having been a victim of that, but I just think it's not good for the court, it's not good for the country, it's not good for litigants, it's not good for the Congress -- it makes them look bad -- and it's terribly, terribly unfair to the nominees....

Q. Do you think it will change the nominees that come out of the White House?

A. I think it will. [Rep.] Chris Cox, [R-Calif., who recently withdrew his name from consideration] is already an example of that. I think there was a recognition that while [Republicans] controlled the committee, they have an ability to push a little harder with respect to getting people through. Look at the Ted Olson [for solicitor general] vote -- there was a lot of reluctance and grumbling, but it went through, and Ted was confirmed. I think that's a different dynamic now.... When the Republicans controlled the committee, they could make Democrats vote against nominees. When the Democrats are controlling the committee, they can make it so they don't have to vote against the nominees because they can make it so the nominee never comes up for a vote.

Q. How do you see the power shift changing potential Supreme Court justice nominees, should there be any?

A. Same way.... More ability on the Democrats to insist on a more moderate nominee, more ability to insist on whatever a time they need to be adequate for scrutiny. I mean, it's an agenda-controlling power, and that process impact has a substance impact.

Q. Do you expect to see a similar situation at the end of a Bush term, or a Bush administration? Do you expect to see nominees left hanging, as you were?

A. I think there will be nominees left hanging at the end of every administration. And there have been, if you look historically, some number of nominees left hanging at the end of every administration. I think the thing that was discouraging and problematic about 2000 was that the slow-down in confirming nominees began much, much earlier than it ever had historically and the sort of line-in-the-sand decision by the majority at that time, that no more, especially no more appellate court nominees, were going to get through, came much earlier.... So that it was more and earlier and the thing I worry about -- and I worry about the Democrats doing it, too -- is saying, "fine, you did it more and earlier, we'll do it even more and even more earlier." We start slowing down after the first year in the administration? You know, the president's president for four years, and while I recognize that inevitably you are going to have political things that are going to result in some nominees being left hanging, especially those nominated late, very late, in the administration, a few months left, I actually think that President Bush's suggestion during the campaign was a pretty good one if it could be done as a practical matter. That unless there's a specific, individual reason not to do so, every nominee ought to have a hearing and a vote within 60 days.

Q. What do you think could be done to expedite the process?

A. At the nomination stage, there's cautiousness on the part of the White House as the nominating entity to do everything they can to avoid political embarrassment from nominating somebody who has some stain on their background, and they want to avoid that by finding out everything they possibly can about that nominee in advance, so that if there is something there they don't like, they can decide, "well then, we're not going to nominate that person." But that causes extraordinary delay and is highly intrusive sort of well beyond what I think anybody would think was rational or normal. And it's all about political defense on the part of the nominating entity. And the same thing that goes on with respect to the confirmation process is that -- and that's more I think on political offense -- people are attacked and are charicaturized and defined in very simplistic terms because that's politically convenient to do and may appeal to interest groups and others in a way that is terribly unfair and dangerous to nominees...

Q. Is there anything else you'd like to discuss?

A. I went back... and I pulled a column that I had read from the Washington Post on April 1 -- I think it was intended as an April Fool's Day column. Because there was a line in it that I remembered... where the guy writing the story says: "The nomination system is a national disgrace. It encourages bullies and emboldens demagogues, silences the voices of responsibility, and nourishes the lowest forms of partisan combat. It uses innocent citizens as pawns in politicians' petty games and stains the reputations of good people. It routinely violates fundamental democratic principles, undermines the quality and consistency of public management, and breaches simple decency." And I remember, when I read it originally, I went, "Yeah, that's right."

Democrats Must Demand Fair Split Among Judges

Edward Lazarus

With the power shift on Capitol Hill, the issue of how the Senate should approach President George W. Bush's judicial nominations takes center stage. Both parties have staked out positions on the question of what standards senators should use in evaluating Bush's picks for the federal bench. Echoing the theme of Democrats when former President Bill Clinton's nominees were pending, Republicans now argue that the Senate should confirm all "qualified" nominees regardless of ideology.

Meanwhile, Democrats, borrowing the GOP tune of the past eight years, respond that the Senate has an obligation to reject "extremists." Both responses are inadequate. The GOP approach is wrongheaded, because a judicial nominee's ideology cannot be separated from his qualifications. Ideology is an inevitable part of a nominee's suitability for the federal bench. For their part, the Democrats are wrong to suggest that ideologically conservative nominees are "extremist." Generally speaking, Bush's nominees, even the very conservative ones, are mainstream participants in the contemporary debate over how judges should interpret the Constitution.

Twisting nominees' records to cast them as extremists is destructive and unnecessary. Every senator, Democrat and Republican alike, has a duty to assess a nominee's judicial values and methods against his or her standard for how judges should interpret the Constitution and federal law. Every senator has the right to reject a nominee for the simple reason that the senator believes the nominee's approach to legal issues to be importantly wrong-even if not extremist. Our legal culture has two factions. Basically, the "liberals" would support nominees who would preserve Roe vs. Wade and affirmative action, support a rigorous separation of church and state, be skeptical of the death penalty and believe the Constitution vests broad power in the federal government even at the expense of states' rights.

Legal "conservatives" hold diametrically opposite views. As a candidate, Bush promised that adherence to the conservative side of this debate-the side embodied by Justices Antonin Scalia and Clarence Thomas-would be an essential qualification for nomination to the federal bench. Taking the advice of conservative advisers, Bush has selected a core group of highly credentialed, conservative ideologues for appellate courts (such as the Sixth, 10th and D.C. circuits) that are closely divided between liberals and conservatives.

On these battleground circuits, a single new judge might tip the balance to the conservative side. Meanwhile, Bush assigned moderate nominees to circuits so overwhelmingly liberal or conservative that the views of one new appointee will have little impact. This strategy isn't inappropriate. In presidential elections, voters choose one candidate over another in part because they believe he'll nominate judges who share a vision of the Constitution and the proper judicial role.

By the same token, however, Democratic senators owe a duty to their constituents to refuse confirmation on the same overtly ideological grounds. If our divided government is any measure, the nation is evenly split between the liberal and conservative approaches to constitutional law. It thus is incumbent on Senate Democrats to ensure that the federal courts-the independent third branch of government-reflect the nation's ambivalence. This principle should apply even to the best of Bush's ideological nominees: Michael McConnell, Bush's selection for the U.S. Court of Appeals for the 10th Circuit (which covers Colorado, Kansas, New Mexico, Oklahoma, Utah and Wyoming). McConnell has distinguished himself as a constitutional scholar and has handled important constitutional-law cases. Those who know him, including liberals, say his temperament is suited to the job.

From a Democratic perspective, however, McConnell is profoundly wrong in his approach. First, he is (like Robert Bork) an adherent of the school of constitutional thought that asserts judges should interpret the Constitution according to the "original intent" of the framers. As shown in the Bork hearings, this approach is irremediably flawed. Divining the framers' intent is usually impossible (for one thing, the various framers were rarely of one mind). Moreover, experience with Antonin Scalia, Clarence Thomas and other originalist practitioners shows that their search for original intent is little more than a cloak conservative judges use to dress up their value-laden decisions in the neutral garb of historical inquiry.

Although McConnell may not be on record opposing Roe vs. Wade, his originalist approach makes his opposition a foregone conclusion. In addition, as an avowed fundamentalist Christian, he's arguably the legal world's leading advocate for lowering the wall between church and state. None of these views makes McConnell an extremist. He's more moderate than most conservatives on some issues. At bottom, though, McConnell follows a deeply troubled methodology to reach deeply troubling conclusions. That's grounds enough for rejecting him.

Democratic senators have the right-and even a duty-to force the administration into a compromise on judicial nominations so that the federal courts, now evenly balanced, will continue to reflect the close division in the electorate at large. Such a compromise might involve jointly identifying judicial moderates (a rare breed) or taking turns in choosing judges for the battleground circuit courts. In the meantime, Democrats should honestly and without apology have the courage of their convictions.

Sutton is Not The Saint Portrayed in 'Dispatch'
Andrew J. Imparato, President, American Association of People With Disabilities

Regarding the May 26 Dispatch editorial "Injustice," criticizing the " vexing problem" of disability advocates taking to the streets of Columbus to publicize their opposition to President Bush's nomination of former Ohio solicitor Jeffrey Sutton to the 6th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals, I would encourage the newspaper to consider the facts:

Sutton has been the lead attorney in a series of cases that have limited the ability of individuals to assert their civil rights in federal court.

He has not been simply a lawyer representing a client in one unpopular case, as the editorial suggested. Rather, he aggressively has pursued a prominent national role as the champion of a vocal and powerful minority of far-right legal theorists. Sutton and his allies have had increasing success in revisiting a states'-rights debate that the majority of Americans thought was decided during the Civil War and reinforced during the civil- rights struggles of the 1950s and 1960s.

Disability advocates and our allies have not sought to prevent Sutton from receiving a fair hearing before the Senate Judiciary Committee. Instead, we have sought to educate the senators and their constituents about Sutton's record.

Our ability to assert and enforce our civil rights is not simply "our favorite issue," as The Dispatch asserted.

For us, strong disability-rights enforcement is a matter of life with dignity and equal opportunity.

Gearing up to Vote on Court Nominees

Jonathan Ringel

Officially, the confirmation process for President George W. Bush's judicial nominees was stuck in limbo last week as Senate leaders haggled over the rules of engagement under the new Democratic majority. But beyond those negotiations, the judicial nomination process is moving ahead. Sen. Patrick Leahy, D-Vt., the new chairman of the Senate Judiciary Committee, says he will hold his first confirmation hearings about two weeks after new Majority Leader Tom Daschle, D-S.D., and Republicans come to an agreement. And an administration source says Bush is expected to name six to 10 new nominees this week, including several district court choices.

The way the Senate will treat judicial nominations is reportedly the sticking point in the secretive negotiations between Daschle and a team of five Republicans, including Sen. Orrin Hatch of Utah, the ranking minority member on the Judiciary Committee. Republicans appear to be seeking some assurances that Democrats will treat the appointees, and any potential Supreme Court nominee, with some degree of deference. Democrats, who will soon have a majority on the committee, may feel little pressure to offer anything more than their counterparts did during the Clinton administration.

Leahy has already said he will enforce the "blue slip" rule, by which the Judiciary Committee will not hold hearings or votes on nominees opposed by home-state senators. Republicans argue this rule gives individual senators too much power over presidential nominations. President Bush so far has made 17 nominations -- 15 to circuit courts of appeals and two to district courts. Around the country, 104 federal judgeships are vacant -- 33 on circuit courts and 71 on district courts. None of Bush's selections has been the subject of hearings before the Judiciary Committee.

When the committee was in its final days of Republican control, three nominees -- John Roberts Jr. for the D.C. Circuit and Sixth Circuit nominees Deborah Cook and Jeffrey Sutton -- had been scheduled to appear at a May 23 hearing. But their day before the panel was scuttled after vehement opposition by Democrats, who the next day won control of the Senate when Vermont Sen. James Jeffords announced he would defect from the GOP and become an independent. Democrats had argued that the committee should not hold hearings until the American Bar Association's standing committee on the federal judiciary had completed its reviews of nominees.

Now that things have changed, it's unlikely that Leahy would hold hearings on any nominee whose ABA rating is not completed. Leahy spokesman David Carle says the committee has received a few of the ratings so far, but is not yet prepared to make them public. While the ABA conducts an extensive background check, the reviews typically consist of only one sheet of paper describing the nominee as "well qualified," "qualified" or "not qualified." Carle also says the committee has yet to choose which of the nominees will be the first to have hearings.

The Judiciary Committee itself will undergo a change as a result of the power shift, with the likely scenario being one Democrat joining the 18-member committee to give the Democrats a one-vote majority. Leahy has spoken to former trial lawyer Sen. John Edwards of North Carolina about the slot, but no agreement has been reached. A spokeswoman for Sen. Zell Miller, a Georgia Democrat who has argued for Democrats to give great deference to President Bush's nominations, calls speculation that Miller was angling for a spot on judiciary "overblown." "He's perfectly happy with what he's got," said Miller press secretary Joan Kirchner, referring to Miller's current posts on the agriculture, banking and veterans' affairs committees.

Administration officials would not say who Bush will nominate next week, but it could be time for several previously reported candidates to have their day. Among those are U.S. Magistrate Judge William Steele of Mobile, Ala., for the Eleventh Circuit; Iowa U.S. District Judge Michael Melloy for the Eighth Circuit; and University of Utah professor Paul Cassell for a district court seat in that state. In March, Tennessee Republican Sens. Fred Thompson and Bill Frist made three recommendations for a single open seat on the Sixth Circuit. They are: Robert Echols, U.S. district chief judge in Nashville; Julia Gibbons, U.S. district chief judge in Memphis; and Lin Howard of Harwell Howard Hyne Gabbert & Manner in Nashville.

Montana may not be ground zero of the political warfare over judges, but it has gotten more than its share of attention from the Bush administration. If the Senate confirms litigator Sam Haddon and U.S. Magistrate Judge Richard Cebull, it's a good bet that folks with business before the federal court there will breathe a sigh of relief. The court has only three judges, and in the past year, Judges Jack Shanstrom and Charles Lovell took senior status, meaning they had significantly reduced their caseloads. That leaves Chief Judge Donald Molloy as the court's only active judge, He has had to focus on criminal cases in order to comply with speedy trial demands, while the civil docket has taken a back seat.

Fortunately for Molloy, Montana Sens. Conrad Burns, a Republican, and Max Baucus, a Democrat, were able to agree on recommendations for the posts. Such bipartisan agreement certainly helped speed the process at the White House and could do the same in the Senate. Meanwhile, the Montana federal court has been relying on help from nearby states. Lou Aleksich, the court clerk, says four federal judges have come to Montana to preside over civil trials this month.

Daschle Agrees to GOP Proposal for Vote on Supreme Court Nominees

Jesse J. Holland

Senators will decide whether President Bush's Supreme Court nominees get automatic confirmation votes from the full Senate without risking rejection by the Judiciary Committee, Senate Majority Leader Thomas Daschle said Tuesday.

Republicans asked for such treatment during negotiations over how to reorganize the newly Democrat-controlled Senate. The GOP is afraid that Democrats would block Bush's judicial nominations and has been looking for a way to ensure Bush's top nominees will at least make it to the floor. Daschle opposes any guarantees for Bush nominees. "We will provide them an opportunity for the vote, but I would hope the Senate would show its common sense and would vote against that particular proposal," said Daschle, D-S.D.

The GOP originally asked for guaranteed Senate votes on all Supreme Court and federal appellate court nominees and elimination of the secret veto process for some judicial nominations, but Daschle refused. The Republicans then modified their request to guaranteed Supreme Court votes only.

Democrats control the Senate by a 50-49 margin. Sen. Jim Jeffords of Vermont threw the chamber to the Democrats when he defected from the Republican Party to become the Senate's sole independent.

Daschle said he would ask his party to vote against the provision when the Senate votes. "I expect we will prevail," he said.

Calls to Republican senators involved in the negotiations with Daschle were not returned. A senior GOP leadership aide described Daschle's agreement to a vote on how Supreme Court nominees will be handled as a step in the right direction.

Daschle agreed to another Republican request: to make the senatorial "blue-slip" veto process public instead of private, as it has been in the past. "We certainly oppose private blue slips, and I'm prepared to incorporate the public blue-slip policy in the organizing resolution itself," Daschle said.

While the Senate Judiciary Committee has never in modern history kept a Supreme Court nominee from coming to a vote, the resolution would render the committee powerless to stop a future Supreme Court nominee no matter what the controlling party thinks.

"In essence, what their proposal would do is to create a 100-member judiciary committee, bypassing, if they wish, the Judiciary Committee itself. We're not prepared to do that," Daschle said. "We think that, for this institution, for careful consideration of the nominees themselves, we ought to continue to maintain the Senate practice of insisting that all nominees be considered and voted upon in the Judiciary Committee."

The provisions would only be binding on Congress until January 2003. It would also be negated if Republicans were to take back control of the chamber, which would force senators to vote on a new organizing resolution.

Daschle said Democrats would insist that changes become a permanent part of the Senate process if they are approved. "This ought not be something we just do for this Congress," he said.

The Senate will vote on the Supreme Court provision, and on reorganizing the chamber, before they leave for the Independence Day holiday, Daschle said.

The two sides also agreed that Democrats will gain a one-seat majority on each Senate committee, and the size of committees will be expanded to accommodate the one-seat Democratic edge. All Republicans will keep their committee assignments, and committee finances and space agreements negotiated at the beginning of the year will continue in effect as well.

The Senate will not work on any of Bush's nominees until after those votes, the majority leader said.

Bush has not nominated anyone for the Supreme Court because there are no openings. He has made several lower court nominations.

Despite Appearances, Confirmation Process for Judicial Nominees Makes Progress

Jonathan Ringel

WASHINGTON -- Officially, the confirmation process for President George W. Bush's judicial nominees was stuck in limbo last week as Senate leaders haggled over the rules of engagement under the new Democratic majority. But beyond those negotiations, the judicial nomination process is moving ahead.

Sen. In Florida, Republican leaders have 70 lawyers to choose from -- including prominent names and relative unknowns -- in deciding whom to recommend to Bush for three federal judgeships and three U.S. attorney spots in the state.

The two vacant judgeships in the southern district drew the most applicants. But an open seat in the middle district attracted 19 candidates. The U.S. attorney spots in the northern, middle and southern districts drew 10, nine and eight applicants, respectively. Many applicants hedged their bets by applying for more than one position.

Gov. Jeb Bush, Rep. E. Clay Shaw Jr., R-Fla., and Rep. C.W. Young, R-Fla., will pick the finalists to recommend to the White House.

Back in Familiar Role, ABA Rates 6 Judicial Nominees

Jonathan Ringel

Six of President George W. Bush's nominees for the federal appeals courts have received "qualified" or "well qualified" ratings from the American Bar Association's standing committee on the federal judiciary. These are the first ratings to come from the ABA committee since President George W. Bush in March kicked the group out of its 48-year role prescreening potential judicial nominees for the White House.

The ABA saw its stock rise again with the switch to Democratic control of the Senate, and Senate Judiciary Chairman Patrick Leahy, D-Vt., has promised to consider the evaluations before commencing hearings on any individual nominee. The panel has so far given the highest ratings to three sitting district judges seeking elevation to their appeals courts, according to documents released by the Senate Judiciary Committee and other sources. The committee unanimously gave a "well qualified" rating to Judge Barrington Parker Jr. of the federal trial court in New York, nominated for a seat on the Second Circuit U.S. Court of Appeals. Parker, an African-American, was nominated to the district court in 1994 by then-President Bill Clinton.

A majority of the ABA panel gave Judge Edith Brown Clement of the federal trial court in New Orleans, nominated for the Fifth Circuit, a "well qualified" rating. A minority of the panel rated Clement "qualified," according to the documents, and one unidentified member of the panel abstained from voting. Clement was nominated to the trial court in 1991 by then-President George Bush.

A nominee to the Fourth Circuit, Judge Dennis Shedd of the federal trial court in Columbia, S.C., also received a majority "well qualified," minority " qualified" rating, according to a source. When Bush nominated him to his current seat in 1990, Shedd, a former staffer to Sen. Strom Thurmond, R-S.C., had received a mixed "qualified/not qualified" ABA rating, according to a press account from the time. Jeffrey Sutton, a Sixth Circuit nominee, received a majority "qualified," minority "well qualified" rating. Sutton, a partner in the Columbus, Ohio, office of Jones, Day, Reavis & Pogue, has successfully argued several Supreme Court cases on behalf of litigants challenging acts of Congress as overreaching, including parts of the Violence Against Women Act and the Americans With Disabilities Act.

Ohio Supreme Court Justice Deborah Cook, also named to the Sixth Circuit, was unanimously rated "qualified." Cook, on the state high court for six years, was strongly backed in her 2000 re-election race by the Ohio business community, but opposed by African-American and plaintiffs lawyer groups. The ABA panel was also unanimous in calling Fourth Circuit Judge Roger Gregory "qualified." Gregory was a Richmond litigator until late last year, when President Clinton, in a controversial move, named him to the Fourth Circuit while Congress was out of session. Bush's decision to renominate Gregory, who is the first African-American judge on the Fourth Circuit, was seen as an attempt to mollify Democrats poised to block his nominees. A senior Bush administration official said the ratings "reaffirm the choice of these candidates as ones of high competence and integrity."

The ABA is expected to issue ratings shortly on the five other judicial nominees the president announced in May, including appellate advocates Miguel Estrada and John Roberts Jr. for the D.C. Circuit; North Carolina federal Judge Terrence Boyle for the Fourth Circuit; Texas high court Justice Priscilla Owen for the Fifth Circuit; and University of Utah law professor Michael McConnell for the 10th Circuit. President Bush has since nominated five others to circuit court posts, and three to district court posts. He announced Monday that he intends to nominate Magistrate Judge Terry Wooten to the U.S. district court in South Carolina.

The ABA panel conducts dozens of interviews with lawyers, judges and others regarding each nominee, evaluates the nominees' qualifications with regard to integrity, professional competence and judicial temperament, and hands out one of three ratings: "well qualified," "qualified," and "not qualified." The committee consists of one member from each of 12 federal judicial circuits, two from the huge Ninth Circuit and a chairwoman, Patricia Hynes of Milberg, Weiss, Bershad, Hynes & Lerach. Ever since the ABA committee gave mixed ratings to Republican Supreme Court nominees Robert Bork (the majority found him "well qualified" while the minority said he was "not qualified") and Clarence Thomas (the majority said " qualified," the minority "not qualified"), the committee has come under strong criticism from conservatives.

In March, the Bush administration removed the group from its formal role. White House Counsel Alberto Gonzales said at the time that the president did not want to give the ABA a

"preferential" role above other groups that could weigh in on the judiciary. Liberal groups decried the decision for removing an important peer review from the process and said it was a sign that Bush was trying to ease the way to push the judiciary to the right. Leahy would not comment on individual nominees Monday, according to a spokesman. Leahy has said he expects to hold hearings on nominees about two weeks after the Senate leadership completes reorganization negotiations.

Bush Wants Cassell as Judge

Lee Davidson

WASHINGTON -- President Bush has nominated University of Utah law professor Paul G. Cassell to become a judge in the U.S. District Court for Utah.

If confirmed by the Senate, Cassell would replace retired Judge David Sam.

Cassell, who was nominated Tuesday, is considered an expert on victims rights. He represented relatives of victims of the Oklahoma City bombing who wanted to attend the trial of Timothy McVeigh but had been excluded by a judge's order.

While he initially lost the case seeking to allow them to attend, he turned to Congress and helped push through a victims-rights bill in two weeks that forced the judge to allow their attendance.

"The judicial system would be a much better place if we had more Paul Cassells and Judge (Richard) Matschs (who refused to block McVeigh's execution)," said Marsha Kight, with the National Organization for Victims Assistance. Her daughter, Frankie Merrell, was killed in the Oklahoma City bombing.

"He'll make an excellent judge," she said, praising Cassell's representation of her and other relatives of Oklahoma City bombing victims.

Calls to Cassell and the law school for comment on his nomination were not immediately returned.

Cassell also argued but lost a high-profile case before the Supreme Court seeking to allow some confessions to stand even if police failed to give "Miranda" warnings telling those interrogated that they have the right to remain silent.

Cassell, 41, has been a professor of law at the University of Utah since 1992.

He was an assistant U.S. attorney in the Eastern District of Virginia from 1988-91, and was an associate deputy U.S. attorney general from 1986-88.

Cassell was a law clerk for Warren E. Burger, former chief justice of the United States, from 1985-86. He was also a clerk for Antonin Scalia (now a U.S. Supreme Court justice) when he was a judge on the U.S. District Court of Appeals in Washington, D.C.

Cassell received his law degree from Stanford University in 1984, and received his bachelor's degree there in 1979.

He was admitted to the bar in Pennsylvania in 1986 and to the Utah bar in 1992.

Cassell is the second University of Utah law professor to be nominated by Bush for a judgeship. Michael W. McConnell was nominated to the Denver-based 10th Circuit Court of Appeals. His nomination is also pending before the Senate Judiciary Committee.

Utah Law Professor Nominated for Federal Bench

Paul Foy

President Bush has nominated University of Utah law professor Paul Cassell to replace U.S. District Court Judge David Sam.

Cassell, 42, is a conservative legal scholar who has criticized the aggressive federal prosecution of Salt Lake's Olympic bid leaders.

He also is a victims' rights advocate who argued before the U.S. Supreme Court last year that some criminal confessions should stand even when police fail to give suspects the Miranda warning on their right to remain silent. The court disagreed.

Cassell was an assistant U.S. attorney in the Eastern District of Virginia from 1988-91, and associate deputy U.S. attorney general from 1986-88.

He was sponsored by Sen. Orrin Hatch, R-Utah, for the federal bench and nominated by President Bush on Tuesday.

"It's obviously a great opportunity to serve on the bench and I'm honored the president has put my name forward," Cassell said Wednesday in San Diego, Calif., where he was vacationing with his wife and three children.

If confirmed by the U.S. Senate, Cassell would take on the full-time vacancy opened in Utah in late 1999 when Sam went on senior, semiretired status. Sam will continue to handle some cases and has been assigned to preside over the Olympic bribery trial of Salt Lake bid chief Tom Welch and his deputy, Dave Johnson. The trial is set to begin July 16.

Cassell's nomination to the bench silenced his often provocative critique of the government's case. He was no apologist for Welch and Johnson, but Cassell argued the U.S. Justice Department devised elaborate conspiracy, fraud and racketeering theories when simpler charges would suffice.

Welch and Johnson were indicted by a federal grand jury on charges of conspiring over a decade to bribe the International Olympic Committee by plying its members with $1 million in cash, scholarships, travel, medical care and excessive gifts. The defendants maintain they did nothing criminally wrong or different from other bid cities.

Cassell doesn't expect to handle any aspect of the Olympic case. He would take one of five full-time positions at the U.S. District Court for Utah, which has been understaffed for a year. Each judge handles about 100 criminal and 300 civil cases a year.

Sam, 67, handles about half of the usual caseload of full-time judges as a semi-retired judge.

Cassell represented families of victims of the Oklahoma City bombing who were initially barred from attending the trial of Timothy McVeigh, who was executed June 11.

He helped usher a victims' rights bill through Congress that forced the judge in the McVeigh case to make room for the victims' relatives at trial.

"He'll make an excellent judge," Marsha Kight, whose daughter was killed in the blast, told the Deseret News.

Cassell was a law clerk for former Supreme Court Chief Justice Warren E. Burger from 1985-86. He served as clerk to Antonin Scalia, now a Supreme Court justice, when Scalia was on the U.S. District Court of Appeals in Washington, D.C.

Cassell received bachelor's and law degrees from Stanford University and was admitted to the Pennsylvania bar in 1986 and the Utah bar in 1992.

He is the second University of Utah law professor to be nominated by Bush for a judgeship. Michael W. McConnell's nomination to the Denver-based 10th Circuit Court of Appeals is pending before the Senate Judiciary Committee.

Ready to Rumble

Byron York

In coming weeks, Democrats on the Senate Judiciary Committee plan to hold a series of hearings which they say will help clarify the issues involved in the judicial-confirmation process - and which Republicans believe will serve to establish a legal and political basis for rejecting George W. Bush's nominees for federal judgeships.

Next Tuesday, New York Democrat Charles Schumer, the new chairman of the Subcommittee on Administrative Oversight and the Courts, will hold a hearing entitled, "Should Ideology Matter? Judicial Nominations 2001." Next month, according to Senate sources, committee chairman Patrick Leahy will hold hearings to discuss the Rehnquist Court, federal jurisprudence, and conservative judicial activism.

Republicans believe the hearings will amount to a one-two punch against Bush's nominees. The Schumer session will establish that it is acceptable to oppose nominees solely on ideological grounds, and the Leahy hearing will suggest that Bush's nominees hold views that are dangerously out of touch with those of most Americans. The end result will be the conclusion that Democrats are justified in voting against the president's nominees, even if they seem well-qualified to hold office.

Democrats deny that there is any overarching strategy at work. "Basically, the senator wants to take a look at how we should view the process for confirming judges," says Schumer spokesman Bradley Tusk. "What role should ideology play? I think there's some confusion on how we should deal with the issue."

Nevertheless, the witness lists for the hearings are likely to be tilted in favor of the emerging Democratic consensus that senators can legitimately vote against judges on the basis of ideology alone. In the past, senators who disagreed with a nominee's judicial philosophy have often been forced to search for a disqualifying flaw on which they could base their opposition, while steadfastly maintaining that ideology had nothing to do with it.

For example, in the 1987 fight over the Supreme Court nomination of Robert Bork, wrote the Washington Post's E.J. Dionne in an influential recent column, "Liberals couldn't simply oppose Bork. To block him, they had to trash him." Now, Dionne continued, Democrats are "no longer shilly-shallying. They're saying, right from the start, that they'll oppose judicial nominees on philosophical grounds alone."

Republicans have gotten the message. "They're laying the groundwork," one GOP aide says of the Democrats' plans. "They're trying to paint all of our judges as right-wing extremists who are here to turn back the clock on civil rights. To be mainstream and moderate, therefore, they have to stop them."

Meanwhile, as Schumer and Leahy plan their hearings, the work of actually confirming the president's nominees has ground to a halt. No hearings have been scheduled for the confirmation of any of the nearly two-dozen nominees so far announced by the White House.

Organizing Talks Go On, But Daschle Readies For Showdown

Senate Majority Leader Daschle could bring up a new organizational resolution for the Senate as early as this week--a move that could allow committees to function normally, while putting an end to weeks of contentious negotiations. Nevertheless, Daschle and a team of GOP negotiators continued to exchange communications Tuesday--a sign that a chance remained for the two sides to broker a final deal and avoid a partisan fight on the Senate floor.

Daschle told reporters that he would bring up a resolution this week that reflects areas on which Republicans and Democrats can agree, while allowing Republicans to offer amendments to address their concerns about moving judicial nominees. But a team of GOP negotiators met in Minority Leader Lott's office Tuesday evening to prepare yet another Republican offer for Daschle.

"I think we're sending him something that will be worthy of consideration," said Sen. Pete Domenici, R-N.M. Said Sen. Phil Gramm, R-Texas; "The whole thing might be avoided. We might have an agreement." Gramm downplayed the idea of a GOP filibuster to block an organizing resolution.

Daschle addressed reporters after meeting with his Democratic colleagues to describe an earlier offer from the GOP negotiating team on the organizing resolution. He said the Democratic Caucus was "disappointed" in the GOP offer, adding, "My five Republican colleagues have chosen to terminate the negotiations."

Daschle said he had hoped to avoid a partisan floor fight over the organizing resolution. Nevertheless, allowing a vote on the GOP proposals would give Republicans something they had been seeking in talks with Daschle last week.

Daschle rejected GOP demands for a "guarantee" that judicial nominations would come to a vote, saying such an approach "undermines" the Senate.

"What they want is a 100-member Judiciary Committee, [and] we're not prepared to do that," Daschle said.

Other Democrats echoed that sentiment at the Tuesday meeting of their Caucus.

"I don't know of a self-respecting member of a committee who would tolerate bypassing their committee," said Sen. Christopher Dodd, D-Conn. Daschle said he had asked Lott to offer specific proposals on the two issues Republicans raised, and he expected Democrats had the votes to head off the GOP proposal. "My guess is it would be pretty much a party-line vote," said a Democratic aide.

Daschle said Democrats were willing to accept a GOP proposal to make public the "blue slip" process--by which a single senator can block action on a judicial nominee. He noted that Sen. Richard Durbin, D-Ill., proposed such a move in 1997, only to draw opposition from then-Judiciary Chairman Hatch.

"I just hope they would support this for future Congresses, not just this Congress," Daschle said of Republicans. The Democratic aide said Republicans "made clear" that they would not filibuster the organizing resolution if they received votes on their proposals. Dodd said if Republicans decided to hold up the Senate's business over the organizing resolution, "you open yourself up to looking terribly petty."

Another Democratic aide said preparations were under way for Majority Whip Reid to move into the choice office space now occupied by Minority Whip Nickles. Republicans and Democrats have said they generally agree on issues of staff, office space and a one-seat Democratic majority on committees, all of which are also in the organizing resolution.

The negotiations over Senate organization took place behind the scenes as Daschle struggled to bring managed care legislation to the floor despite GOP objections (see related article, page 12).

The Senate reached a unanimous consent agreement late Tuesday to schedule a vote on a motion to proceed to the bill Thursday morning. Daschle had indicated earlier in the day that he would file a cloture motion on the bill if a UC could not be reached. Daschle said it was important for the Senate to complete managed care legislation before the July Fourth recess, while also mentioning an FY01 defense supplemental appropriations bill--in order to leave the rest of July available to move appropriations bills.

Senate Republicans had objected to a Democratic motion to proceed to the patients' rights bill, and Daschle indicated he was prepared to file a cloture motion Tuesday that would lead to a cloture vote Thursday.

Amid signs of GOP foot-dragging, Daschle also threatened to cut into the precious July Fourth recess to complete action on the managed care bill. "I'll see you for the fireworks on the Fourth," Daschle told reporters. Republicans warned they were in no hurry to rush through that measure.

"Washington, D.C., is a very interesting place on July Fourth," said Nickles, who added, "Whether we're in for a couple of days [during the planned break] is irrelevant." But Nickles stressed that Republicans would do battle over the substance of the bill and had "no intention of filibustering this bill."

Still, Lott has not ruled out the possibility of a filibuster to block the measure. Republicans objected to a motion to proceed to the bill, on the grounds that they had not been given a chance to review changes made to the legislation last week.

Sen. Judd Gregg, R-N.H., said Daschle had been "a bit autocratic" in his decision to bring up the bill, adding, "I think we need a couple of days to talk about what the bill is."

Daschle laughed off GOP charges that the legislation had been secretly rewritten, saying he was bringing up the same bill listed on the Senate calendar.

Daschle and Reid stressed that the Senate would work through the July Fourth recess if necessary to complete work on the patients' rights bill. But, under those circumstances, Daschle said the chamber would be off July Fourth for the day.

Picking Judges: Democrats Should Stand Their Ground
Edward Lazarus

With the power shift on Capitol Hill, the issue of how the Senate should approach President Bush's judicial nominations has moved to center stage. Both sides already have staked out positions on the substantive question of what standards senators should use in evaluating Bush's picks for the federal bench.

Echoing the theme of Democrats when Clinton's nominees were pending, Republicans now argue that the Senate should confirm all "qualified" nominees (based on their credentials) regardless of ideology. Meanwhile, Democrats, borrowing the GOP tune of the past eight years, respond that the Senate has an obligation to reject ideological "extremists."

Both responses are confused and inadequate. The GOP approach is wrongheaded, because a judicial nominee's ideology cannot be separated from his qualifications. On the contrary, ideology is an inevitable part of a nominee's suitability for the federal bench.

For their part, the Democrats are wrong to suggest that ideologically conservative nominees are "extremist." Generally speaking, Bush's nominees, even the very conservative ones, are mainstream participants in the contemporary debate over how judges should interpret the Constitution.

Twisting the record of nominees in order to cast them as extremists is both destructive and unnecessary. Every senator, Democrat and Republican alike, has a duty to assess a nominee's judicial values and methods against his or her own standard for how judges should interpret the Constitution and federal law. And every senator has the right to reject a nominee for the simple reason that the senator believes the nominee's approach to legal issues to be importantly wrong -- even if not extremist.

Our legal culture is riven into two factions. Basically, the "liberals" would preserve Roe v. Wade and affirmative action, support a rigorous separation of church and state, are skeptical of the death penalty, and believe that the Constitution vests broad power in the federal government even at the expense of states' rights. Legal "conservatives" hold diametrically opposite views.

As a candidate, Bush promised that adherence to the conservative side of this debate – the side embodied by Justices Antonin Scalia and Clarence Thomas -- would be an essential qualification for nomination to the federal bench. As president, Bush has redeemed this promise.

Taking the advice of very conservative advisers, Bush has selected a core group of highly credentialed, conservative ideologues for placement on those appellate courts (such as the 6th, 10th and D.C. circuits) that are closely divided between liberals and conservatives. On these battleground circuits, a single new judge might tip the political balance of an appellate court to the conservative side. Meanwhile, Bush carefully assigned his more moderate nominees to circuits that are so overwhelmingly liberal or conservative that the views of one new appointee will have little impact.

This clever strategy is not inappropriate. In presidential elections, voters choose one candidate over another in part because they believe he will nominate judges who share a certain vision of the Constitution and the proper judicial role. American history is replete with examples of presidents seeking to perpetuate their legacies by filling the judiciary with like-minded judges.

By the same token, however, Democratic senators owe a duty to their constituents to refuse confirmation on the same overtly ideological grounds. If our divided government is any measure, the nation as a whole is evenly split between the liberal and conservative approaches to constitutional law. And it thus is incumbent on Senate Democrats to ensure that the federal courts -- the independent third branch of government -- reflect the nation's profound ambivalence.

This principle should apply to even the best of Bush's ideological nominees -- at the moment, Michael McConnell, Bush's selection for the U.S. Court of Appeals for the 10th Circuit (which presides over federal cases in Colorado, Kansas, New Mexico, Oklahoma, Utah and Wyoming).

McConnell's credentials are impressive. He has distinguished himself as a constitutional law scholar and has handled numerous important constitutional law cases. Those who know him, including liberals, say his temperament is suited to being a judge.

But from a Democratic perspective, McConnell is also profoundly wrong in his approach to the Constitution. First, he is (like Robert Bork) an adherent of the school of constitutional thought that asserts judges should interpret the Constitution according to the "original intent" of the Framers.

As was shown in the Bork hearings, this approach is irremediably flawed. Divining the Framers' intent is usually impossible (for one thing, the various Framers were rarely of one mind). Moreover, experience with Scalia, Thomas and other originalist practitioners shows that their search for original intent is little more than a cloak conservative judges use to dress up their value-laden decisions in the neutral garb of historical inquiry.

On specific issues, although McConnell may not be on record opposing Roe v. Wade, his originalist approach is antithetical to Roe and makes his opposition a foregone conclusion. McConnell is very much on record, moreover, on another hot-button issue: An avowed fundamentalist Christian, he is arguably the legal world's leading advocate for lowering the wall of separation between church and state.

None of these views -- which many conservatives share -- makes McConnell an extremist. Indeed, McConnell is more moderate than most conservatives on some issues. At bottom, though, McConnell follows a deeply troubled methodology to reach deeply troubling conclusions. And that is grounds enough for rejecting him.

In short, Democratic senators have the right -- and even a duty -- to force the administration into a compromise on judicial nominations so that the federal courts, now evenly balanced, will continue to reflect the close division in the electorate at large. Such a compromise might involve jointly identifying judicial moderates (a rare breed) or taking turns in choosing judges for the battleground circuit courts. But in the meantime, Democrats should honestly and without apology have the courage of their convictions. They should just say no. Doing Business in the Senate

The organizing process undertaken by the Senate every two years usually occurs with little fuss. But with a newly constituted Senate now in Democratic control, what used to be a routine housekeeping chore has become a focus of partisan impasse. Republicans are demanding a ban on a parliamentary tactic employed in the past to block some judicial nominations, and they are seeking guarantees that all Supreme Court nominations will be brought to the Senate floor, even if they are rejected in committee. This is a case that can be resolved with some good will. Democrats should give in on one but not both the Republican requests.

The irony, not to say audacity, of the Republican demands is striking. For the six years that Republicans controlled the Senate, they routinely obstructed President Bill Clinton's judicial nominations, often refusing even to hold hearings or a vote in the Judiciary Committee. This page deplored such tactics, so the Democrats' pledge to hold hearings and votes in committee is most welcome. Another tactic used by the Republicans was the so-called "blue slip," in which a senator from the home state of a judicial nominee could anonymously block that nominee from being considered. Despite using that tactic in the past, Republicans are now demanding that any senator using the blue slip be identified. The demand is no doubt galling to Democrats, but they should nevertheless accept it.
Senators who block a nomination from their home state should have the courage to do so publicly.

A separate demand by the Republicans is less worthy of approval. They are asking for a change in Senate rules that would require any nomination for the Supreme Court to be sent to the full Senate even if it is rejected in committee. The fact is that, except for one historical oddity when there was a nomination for a seat that was not yet vacant, neither Republicans nor Democrats can find a case in which a Supreme Court nomination was not submitted to the full Senate. The nominations for Supreme Court of Robert Bork and Clarence Thomas were both voted on by the Senate, even though Mr. Bork was rejected by a majority in committee and Judge Thomas got a tie vote.

Tom Daschle, the Senate majority leader, has promised that the Democrats will give full and fair consideration to all judicial nominations. Citing the Bork and Thomas precedents, he has indicated that he fully expects Supreme Court nominations to be treated as in the past.

Senate rules have for many decades empowered committees to vet nominations and decide whether to approve them. Changing the rules now would undermine the power of the committee at just the time when its new chairman, Patrick Leahy of Vermont, has promised to process the nominations in an evenhanded, open fashion. The Republicans should take him at his word and not try to force an artificial arrangement just because they fear the Democrats will behave as badly as the Republicans did under President Clinton. Above all, Republicans should not be trying to block the Senate from proceeding with its business by demanding arbitrary new rules of the Democrats.

Julie Samuels

As Democrats and Republicans work out a new power-sharing deal in the Senate, the issue of judicial nominees remains a major point of contention. With Democrats controlling the agenda, will President Bush's nominees even get confirmation hearings? Will the Republicans make committee assignments if they don't?

National Journal.com's Julie Samuels spoke with Kent Markus, former counselor to Clinton Attorney General Janet Reno and a onetime judicial nominee himself, about the process, the lack of judges on today's federal bench and how this might all play out in the Democratic-led Senate.

Q. Briefly walk me through the process of your nomination and the experience you had as an example of how the process works -- or maybe doesn't always work. Well, mine was a nomination for a federal appellate court, and I think already it's worth mentioning that the process is quite radically different for the appellate courts as compared with the district courts. Because the appellate court selections are primarily managed, controlled, decided by the White House and the Justice Department, mostly the White House, whereas the district court appointments are pretty much decided by local officials in the state in which the opening exists, usually the United States senators....And so, because we were talking about an appellate court position, mine was mostly a conversation that was taking place among Washington folk. I learned -- through a friend -- that [Judge] Dave Nelson on the 6th Circuit had sent a letter in to the Justice Department indicating an intention some months later to take senior status. That triggered the whole discussion. This was in the mid- to late summer of 1999. The friend at Justice called and said, "You know, we've got this letter, are you interested in the seat?" And I said, "Yes, I'm very interested in the seat."

That began a process of trying to persuade various critical decision makers that I was the right person to be nominated for that seat. I think to the extent that anyone suggests that this is a process -- for any of these court positions -- that you get a call one day from some official calling you to public service because they've researched the backgrounds of all conceivable candidates and determined that you are by far the most worthy isn't telling you the truth. I mean, I don't know anybody who's been involved in any of these conversations that doesn't engage, even though it may be sort of an awkward word to use in this context, in something resembling a campaign to obtain one of these appointments. I think people like to pretend it's substantially more gentile than that, but it isn't. So, I undertook efforts to have various people communicate simultaneously with both the White House and Justice Department and especially key decision makers there that I would be a good nominee for the spot. And these were all people that knew me. I had worked as Attorney General [Janet] Reno's counselor at the Justice Department -- the highest-ranking staff-adviser to the attorney general, so I knew almost everybody who was being communicated with, and yet it still was a process you have to go through to persuade them that, among other conceivable nominees, you're the right one.

At the same time, I was also trying to make sure that, because I had two United States senators from the opposite political party here in Ohio, that were I able to persuade the White House that this was the way to go, that the United States senators were not going to be opposed to my selection. And so there was a similar effort going with Senator [George] Voinovich and even more particularly Senator [Mike] DeWine, since he was senior senator from Ohio and on the Judiciary Committee....And then... nothing happened for a while. And then there was delay and delay and delay, and I would talk to friends who were involved in the weekly meetings at the White House -- "Did the seat come up for discussion this week?"; "No, we didn't get to it, we didn't talk about it"; "Oh, it got mentioned and so-and-so said they heard from so-and-so about you" -- and I sort of would get little bits and scraps and pieces and, you know, my reaction was, "Jeez, I'm peculiarly well-connected, as compared to many people going through this, and still, I can only get little bits and scraps and pieces of information about what's going on and is there really a delay for some substantial reason, that there's a concern about whether I'm the right nominee and they're looking at others, or is it just that other matters are taking a higher priority, or what's going on?"

Just as magically, at some point it finally breaks, and that took until about December. And it was in, if I recall, the third week of December that I finally got the call from the White House saying, "We intend to proceed with your nomination, assuming that everything's OK."

At that point you then begin a much more cumbersome process where you are provided an extraordinary set of forms and questionnaires -- one for the White House, one for the FBI, one for the Justice Department, one for the Senate and Judiciary Committee and one for the administrative office of the courts.... The moment they say "go," in terms of putting together the forms and submitting them, the hurry-up-and-wait process then becomes another hurry-up process because they then, once they've made the decision, want you to get everything in as quickly as you possibly can so that it can be scrutinized and a final determination can be made as to whether you are in fact going to be nominated or whether all these materials and background checks will reveal some problem....

So, you're going nuts trying to put all of this together and get it in. Simultaneously, as soon as you get it in, not only does it trigger the White House own internal evaluation of everything and the FBI check to make sure you're not a drug dealer or you're not beating your spouse or whatever, but that the [American Bar Association] check then began. And they have their own whole process, where they not only interview you, but they interviewed a wide range of people in your legal community and others about you and your integrity and your experience and your knowledge of the law and all those kind of things, for their rating process.... So, you go through with that whole process -- and that all went on from about the third week in December -- in what in this context was considered very speedy – to a nomination on February 9....

From that point, the goal was obviously to seek and obtain a hearing and get a positive confirmation vote and then get a vote of the full Senate with respect to confirmation. One of the critical intermediary steps to be getting such a hearing was, and to this day still remains much in the news, the blue slips returned from your two home-state senators.

I had two Republican senators, and the White House had expressed some skepticism about whether I was going to be able to get two blue slips returned, and I think, in the end, I was the only court of appeals nominee in the country who had blue slips returned by two home-state Republican senators, both saying: "We have no objection to this nominee. You can go ahead and hold hearings if you chose to." But, again, that took time and persuasion and encouragement and there were editorials in the newspapers across the state encouraging the senators to not let this position remain open... and finally Senators Voinovich and DeWine both returned their blue slips to [then Senate Judiciary Committee] Chairman [Orrin] Hatch, [R-Utah], which was yet another critical hurdle covered.... Then it was a whole lobbying process of -- in the election year and in the context in which there was clearly a desire by many to simply say: " Look, we're just not going to confirm people this year, especially court of appeals nominees. Let's hold these seats open, see if we win the White House, and if we do, we get to fill those seats rather than the other guys."

And, in the end, that's exactly what happened to me and lots and lots of other people, and it wasn't even -- I think, to my knowledge -- anything that was focused on any substantial way on me personally. It was just a relatively across-the-board decision among the majority in the Senate... and the strategy paid off.

Q. What do you think about the blue-slip process? A. I don't think it's a good process, and I am one of the people who was not a victim of it. There were others like me who were awaiting confirmation hearings, [and] that was the hurdle they couldn't get across.... I actually had hoped, and the White House had hoped, that being in the somewhat extraordinary position of having two Republican senators return blue slips for a Democratic nominee, might have been enough to break through. And it even might have been something that Hatch could have used as an excuse to say, "Look, I'm not a terrible bad guy, here's a guy who got blue slips returned by his two Republican senators and we moved and proceeded to a hearing on him." That still didn't do it for me.

Even though I wasn't the victim of the process, at least at that point, I just think that it's an inappropriate prerogative, and that's all it is. It's a prerogative that's afforded the individual senators, and I think that I'd rather have... a more deliberative process where we look at candidates, we make a decision, and vote them up or down. I think the big unfortunate part is I think the reason there's such a reluctance to give up that prerogative is that it's substantially politically easier to simply to have nothing happen than to vote against.

Q. It sounded like the longest delay you faced was from the end of September to December. I was curious as to where you think these delays tend to come from.
A. I think they come from everywhere. I think they come -- in terms of the White House decision making -- I do think they come primarily from a combination of managing competing objectives and competing interests and competing candidates and all of that playing out in the decision making. And the general state of affairs that I experienced at high levels of the Justice Department and that I saw at high levels of the White House is you never have time to do all the things you're supposed to be doing.

And so even things that are objectively reasonably important matters suddenly become not terribly important compared to other things that are much more important.... I think when you combine that bureaucratic aspect to it with the political aspect of having to decide among competing candidates, those combine in a nefarious way to result in a delay...

Q. In a broader sense, how do you think the process changed after the 1987 Robert Bork hearings, if it did change at all?

A. I think in general that was a contributor to a sense of a need for tit-for-tat paybacks for actual and perceived slights by both parties. I think it's actually consistent with changes in the Congress that have absolutely nothing to do with nominations. My perception, throughout the '90s, is that Congress became a substantially less civil place, that there was substantially less accommodation that took place among members.... It became a substantially more partisan place. It became a meaner place. I think that was just one aspect and one manifestation of it that had an impact, particularly on nominees.

Q. Do you personally think that a nominee who might be seen as too idealistic is qualified to sit on a federal bench?

A. Depends on what you mean by "too idealistic." ... I think quite clearly being idealistic alone is not disqualifying. I think the critical question in addition to standard qualifying questions... is "What is your view of the role of a judge?" You can be as ideological as you want to be if you don't have any intent or desire to try to foist your own ideological perspective upon the system through your position as a judge. That is, whatever your privately-held views are, so what? -- if you don't seek to impose those views from the bench.... I am not particularly enamored with judges who substantially invade the purview of the legislative branch, and that's something that is loosely referred to as being activist. Unfortunately, I think that term has become very politically charged and one of those terms that's come to mean whatever anybody wants it to mean. But, I think historically, I think it's how much restraint the judge demonstrates vis-à-vis the operations of the other branches, and I think that I'm very uncomfortable with the amount of activism -- with the amount of invasion of the legislative and executive branches -- we're seeing on the judiciary right now.... If someone is highly ideological but also has a very limited and constricted view of the role of judge, I don't have a problem with that person. I have a problem with them if they are highly ideological, and they're on a mission to effectuate that ideology once they get on the bench.

Q. As far as ABA ratings go, I'd like to talk about those for a second because, especially since the power switch -- when Bush first came into office, he said "we aren't going to use them," and then the Democrats came into the majority, and they said, "well, now we are..."

A. And I think even before the power switch the Democrats had said, "you may not be going to use them, but we still want them...." And they had made pretty clear that they were going to wait for an ABA recommendation before they were going to be willing to schedule hearings with regards to candidates who had been nominated. So that, even before the power switch, the effect would have been that the White House would not have had the advantage of information about the ABA's views and ratings before finalizing the nomination decision. They would have finalized their nomination decision and then learned about what the ABA's view is, which I thought was a little risky on their behalf.

That's if they cared one wit about what the ABA said, which apparently they didn't. And so, I think that this power switch has only heightened that a little bit more, which has given Democrats the ability to say: "Look, we really mean that. We're not proceeding with the nominations until we know what the ABA says. And now we control the committee schedule, and we're going to wait for that."

Q. So the role that they're going to play has not changed?

A. I think it's only changed in... timing. It no longer is being used as an element of the White House decision making as to whether to proceed with a contemplated nomination. Instead, the recommendation will come out after the White House decides to make a nomination and will be used primarily in the context of making confirmation decisions.

Q. Right now, there's more than 100 judicial vacancies in the federal court system, which is the most since 1997. How serious of a problem is that?

A. There's a serious problem with respect to the delay, and, in the most cliché of ways, you really have a "justice delayed is justice denied" phenomenon going on. Even while my nomination was pending for the 6th Circuit, and that's now eight, nine months ago when I was involved with these conversations still, the 6th Circuit was a great example. It had become because of the number of vacancies that existed then, the slowest circuit in the country -- the time of argument to the time of decision, with cases averaging in excess of two years to get a decision out of the appeals court. That's crazy. And since that time, there are additional vacancies on the 6th Circuit.

So the suggestions that we can stand to have continuing delays in the fillings of these positions I think is wrong. And I think that the Democrats on the Judiciary Committee are in an awkward position.... They might like to engage in more tit-for-tat; they're angry about what was done to some of the nominees in the Clinton administration. They also full-well recognize that it is just not good for the country and for the system to continue to delay in filling these positions.

Q. As far as the power shift goes, how do you see that affecting the nominating process?

A. I think it's undeniable that it's going to slow it down. I hope that it does not go to a stall, a delay, a blockage. Again, I just think that's wrong. And maybe I'm more acutely cognizant of that having been a victim of that, but I just think it's not good for the court, it's not good for the country, it's not good for litigants, it's not good for the Congress -- it makes them look bad -- and it's terribly, terribly unfair to the nominees....

Q. Do you think it will change the nominees that come out of the White House?

A. I think it will. [Rep.] Chris Cox, [R-Calif., who recently withdrew his name from consideration] is already an example of that. I think there was a recognition that while [Republicans] controlled the committee, they have an ability to push a little harder with respect to getting people through. Look at the Ted Olson [for solicitor general] vote -- there was a lot of reluctance and grumbling, but it went through, and Ted was confirmed. I think that's a different dynamic now.... When the Republicans controlled the committee, they could make Democrats vote against nominees. When the Democrats are controlling the committee, they can make it so they don't have to vote against the nominees because they can make it so the nominee never comes up for a vote.

Q. How do you see the power shift changing potential Supreme Court justice nominees, should there be any?

A. Same way.... More ability on the Democrats to insist on a more moderate nominee, more ability to insist on whatever a time they need to be adequate for scrutiny. I mean, it's an agenda-controlling power, and that process impact has a substance impact.

Q. Do you expect to see a similar situation at the end of a Bush term, or a Bush administration? Do you expect to see nominees left hanging, as you were?

A. I think there will be nominees left hanging at the end of every administration. And there have been, if you look historically, some number of nominees left hanging at the end of every administration. I think the thing that was discouraging and problematic about 2000 was that the slow-down in confirming nominees began much, much earlier than it ever had historically and the sort of line-in-the-sand decision by the majority at that time, that no more, especially no more appellate court nominees, were going to get through, came much earlier.... So that it was more and earlier and the thing I worry about -- and I worry about the Democrats doing it, too -- is saying, "fine, you did it more and earlier, we'll do it even more and even more earlier." We start slowing down after the first year in the administration? You know, the president's president for four years, and while I recognize that inevitably you are going to have political things that are going to result in some nominees being left hanging, especially those nominated late, very late, in the administration, a few months left, I actually think that President Bush's suggestion during the campaign was a pretty good one if it could be done as a practical matter. That unless there's a specific, individual reason not to do so, every nominee ought to have a hearing and a vote within 60 days.

Q. What do you think could be done to expedite the process?

A. At the nomination stage, there's cautiousness on the part of the White House as the nominating entity to do everything they can to avoid political embarrassment from nominating somebody who has some stain on their background, and they want to avoid that by finding out everything they possibly can about that nominee in advance, so that if there is something there they don't like, they can decide, "well then, we're not going to nominate that person." But that causes extraordinary delay and is highly intrusive sort of well beyond what I think anybody would think was rational or normal. And it's all about political defense on the part of the nominating entity. And the same thing that goes on with respect to the confirmation process is that -- and that's more I think on political offense -- people are attacked and are charicaturized and defined in very simplistic terms because that's politically convenient to do and may appeal to interest groups and others in a way that is terribly unfair and dangerous to nominees...

Q. Is there anything else you'd like to discuss?

A. I went back... and I pulled a column that I had read from the Washington Post on April 1 -- I think it was intended as an April Fool's Day column. Because there was a line in it that I remembered... where the guy writing the story says: "The nomination system is a national disgrace. It encourages bullies and emboldens demagogues, silences the voices of responsibility, and nourishes the lowest forms of partisan combat. It uses innocent citizens as pawns in politicians' petty games and stains the reputations of good people. It routinely violates fundamental democratic principles, undermines the quality and consistency of public management, and breaches simple decency." And I remember, when I read it originally, I went, "Yeah, that's right."

Democrats Must Demand Fair Split Among Judges

Edward Lazarus

With the power shift on Capitol Hill, the issue of how the Senate should approach President George W. Bush's judicial nominations takes center stage. Both parties have staked out positions on the question of what standards senators should use in evaluating Bush's picks for the federal bench. Echoing the theme of Democrats when former President Bill Clinton's nominees were pending, Republicans now argue that the Senate should confirm all "qualified" nominees regardless of ideology.

Meanwhile, Democrats, borrowing the GOP tune of the past eight years, respond that the Senate has an obligation to reject "extremists." Both responses are inadequate. The GOP approach is wrongheaded, because a judicial nominee's ideology cannot be separated from his qualifications. Ideology is an inevitable part of a nominee's suitability for the federal bench. For their part, the Democrats are wrong to suggest that ideologically conservative nominees are "extremist." Generally speaking, Bush's nominees, even the very conservative ones, are mainstream participants in the contemporary debate over how judges should interpret the Constitution.

Twisting nominees' records to cast them as extremists is destructive and unnecessary. Every senator, Democrat and Republican alike, has a duty to assess a nominee's judicial values and methods against his or her standard for how judges should interpret the Constitution and federal law. Every senator has the right to reject a nominee for the simple reason that the senator believes the nominee's approach to legal issues to be importantly wrong-even if not extremist. Our legal culture has two factions. Basically, the "liberals" would support nominees who would preserve Roe vs. Wade and affirmative action, support a rigorous separation of church and state, be skeptical of the death penalty and believe the Constitution vests broad power in the federal government even at the expense of states' rights.

Legal "conservatives" hold diametrically opposite views. As a candidate, Bush promised that adherence to the conservative side of this debate-the side embodied by Justices Antonin Scalia and Clarence Thomas-would be an essential qualification for nomination to the federal bench. Taking the advice of conservative advisers, Bush has selected a core group of highly credentialed, conservative ideologues for appellate courts (such as the Sixth, 10th and D.C. circuits) that are closely divided between liberals and conservatives.

On these battleground circuits, a single new judge might tip the balance to the conservative side. Meanwhile, Bush assigned moderate nominees to circuits so overwhelmingly liberal or conservative that the views of one new appointee will have little impact. This strategy isn't inappropriate. In presidential elections, voters choose one candidate over another in part because they believe he'll nominate judges who share a vision of the Constitution and the proper judicial role.

By the same token, however, Democratic senators owe a duty to their constituents to refuse confirmation on the same overtly ideological grounds. If our divided government is any measure, the nation is evenly split between the liberal and conservative approaches to constitutional law. It thus is incumbent on Senate Democrats to ensure that the federal courts-the independent third branch of government-reflect the nation's ambivalence. This principle should apply even to the best of Bush's ideological nominees: Michael McConnell, Bush's selection for the U.S. Court of Appeals for the 10th Circuit (which covers Colorado, Kansas, New Mexico, Oklahoma, Utah and Wyoming). McConnell has distinguished himself as a constitutional scholar and has handled important constitutional-law cases. Those who know him, including liberals, say his temperament is suited to the job.

From a Democratic perspective, however, McConnell is profoundly wrong in his approach. First, he is (like Robert Bork) an adherent of the school of constitutional thought that asserts judges should interpret the Constitution according to the "original intent" of the framers. As shown in the Bork hearings, this approach is irremediably flawed. Divining the framers' intent is usually impossible (for one thing, the various framers were rarely of one mind). Moreover, experience with Antonin Scalia, Clarence Thomas and other originalist practitioners shows that their search for original intent is little more than a cloak conservative judges use to dress up their value-laden decisions in the neutral garb of historical inquiry.

Although McConnell may not be on record opposing Roe vs. Wade, his originalist approach makes his opposition a foregone conclusion. In addition, as an avowed fundamentalist Christian, he's arguably the legal world's leading advocate for lowering the wall between church and state. None of these views makes McConnell an extremist. He's more moderate than most conservatives on some issues. At bottom, though, McConnell follows a deeply troubled methodology to reach deeply troubling conclusions. That's grounds enough for rejecting him.

Democratic senators have the right-and even a duty-to force the administration into a compromise on judicial nominations so that the federal courts, now evenly balanced, will continue to reflect the close division in the electorate at large. Such a compromise might involve jointly identifying judicial moderates (a rare breed) or taking turns in choosing judges for the battleground circuit courts. In the meantime, Democrats should honestly and without apology have the courage of their convictions.

Sutton is Not The Saint Portrayed in 'Dispatch'

Andrew J. Imparato, President, American Association of People With Disabilities

Regarding the May 26 Dispatch editorial "Injustice," criticizing the " vexing problem" of disability advocates taking to the streets of Columbus to publicize their opposition to President Bush's nomination of former Ohio solicitor Jeffrey Sutton to the 6th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals, I would encourage the newspaper to consider the facts:

Sutton has been the lead attorney in a series of cases that have limited the ability of individuals to assert their civil rights in federal court.

He has not been simply a lawyer representing a client in one unpopular case, as the editorial suggested. Rather, he aggressively has pursued a prominent national role as the champion of a vocal and powerful minority of far-right legal theorists. Sutton and his allies have had increasing success in revisiting a states'-rights debate that the majority of Americans thought was decided during the Civil War and reinforced during the civil- rights struggles of the 1950s and 1960s.

Disability advocates and our allies have not sought to prevent Sutton from receiving a fair hearing before the Senate Judiciary Committee. Instead, we have sought to educate the senators and their constituents about Sutton's record.

Our ability to assert and enforce our civil rights is not simply "our favorite issue," as The Dispatch asserted.

For us, strong disability-rights enforcement is a matter of life with dignity and equal opportunity.

Gearing up to Vote on Court Nominees

Jonathan Ringel

Officially, the confirmation process for President George W. Bush's judicial nominees was stuck in limbo last week as Senate leaders haggled over the rules of engagement under the new Democratic majority. But beyond those negotiations, the judicial nomination process is moving ahead. Sen. Patrick Leahy, D-Vt., the new chairman of the Senate Judiciary Committee, says he will hold his first confirmation hearings about two weeks after new Majority Leader Tom Daschle, D-S.D., and Republicans come to an agreement. And an administration source says Bush is expected to name six to 10 new nominees this week, including several district court choices.

The way the Senate will treat judicial nominations is reportedly the sticking point in the secretive negotiations between Daschle and a team of five Republicans, including Sen. Orrin Hatch of Utah, the ranking minority member on the Judiciary Committee. Republicans appear to be seeking some assurances that Democrats will treat the appointees, and any potential Supreme Court nominee, with some degree of deference. Democrats, who will soon have a majority on the committee, may feel little pressure to offer anything more than their counterparts did during the Clinton administration.

Leahy has already said he will enforce the "blue slip" rule, by which the Judiciary Committee will not hold hearings or votes on nominees opposed by home-state senators. Republicans argue this rule gives individual senators too much power over presidential nominations. President Bush so far has made 17 nominations -- 15 to circuit courts of appeals and two to district courts. Around the country, 104 federal judgeships are vacant -- 33 on circuit courts and 71 on district courts. None of Bush's selections has been the subject of hearings before the Judiciary Committee.

When the committee was in its final days of Republican control, three nominees -- John Roberts Jr. for the D.C. Circuit and Sixth Circuit nominees Deborah Cook and Jeffrey Sutton -- had been scheduled to appear at a May 23 hearing. But their day before the panel was scuttled after vehement opposition by Democrats, who the next day won control of the Senate when Vermont Sen. James Jeffords announced he would defect from the GOP and become an independent. Democrats had argued that the committee should not hold hearings until the American Bar Association's standing committee on the federal judiciary had completed its reviews of nominees.

Now that things have changed, it's unlikely that Leahy would hold hearings on any nominee whose ABA rating is not completed. Leahy spokesman David Carle says the committee has received a few of the ratings so far, but is not yet prepared to make them public. While the ABA conducts an extensive background check, the reviews typically consist of only one sheet of paper describing the nominee as "well qualified," "qualified" or "not qualified." Carle also says the committee has yet to choose which of the nominees will be the first to have hearings.

The Judiciary Committee itself will undergo a change as a result of the power shift, with the likely scenario being one Democrat joining the 18-member committee to give the Democrats a one-vote majority. Leahy has spoken to former trial lawyer Sen. John Edwards of North Carolina about the slot, but no agreement has been reached. A spokeswoman for Sen. Zell Miller, a Georgia Democrat who has argued for Democrats to give great deference to President Bush's nominations, calls speculation that Miller was angling for a spot on judiciary "overblown." "He's perfectly happy with what he's got," said Miller press secretary Joan Kirchner, referring to Miller's current posts on the agriculture, banking and veterans' affairs committees.

Administration officials would not say who Bush will nominate next week, but it could be time for several previously reported candidates to have their day. Among those are U.S. Magistrate Judge William Steele of Mobile, Ala., for the Eleventh Circuit; Iowa U.S. District Judge Michael Melloy for the Eighth Circuit; and University of Utah professor Paul Cassell for a district court seat in that state. In March, Tennessee Republican Sens. Fred Thompson and Bill Frist made three recommendations for a single open seat on the Sixth Circuit. They are: Robert Echols, U.S. district chief judge in Nashville; Julia Gibbons, U.S. district chief judge in Memphis; and Lin Howard of Harwell Howard Hyne Gabbert & Manner in Nashville.

Montana may not be ground zero of the political warfare over judges, but it has gotten more than its share of attention from the Bush administration. If the Senate confirms litigator Sam Haddon and U.S. Magistrate Judge Richard Cebull, it's a good bet that folks with business before the federal court there will breathe a sigh of relief. The court has only three judges, and in the past year, Judges Jack Shanstrom and Charles Lovell took senior status, meaning they had significantly reduced their caseloads. That leaves Chief Judge Donald Molloy as the court's only active judge, He has had to focus on criminal cases in order to comply with speedy trial demands, while the civil docket has taken a back seat.

Fortunately for Molloy, Montana Sens. Conrad Burns, a Republican, and Max Baucus, a Democrat, were able to agree on recommendations for the posts. Such bipartisan agreement certainly helped speed the process at the White House and could do the same in the Senate. Meanwhile, the Montana federal court has been relying on help from nearby states. Lou Aleksich, the court clerk, says four federal judges have come to Montana to preside over civil trials this month.

Daschle Agrees to GOP Proposal for Vote on Supreme Court Nominees

Jesse J. Holland

Senators will decide whether President Bush's Supreme Court nominees get automatic confirmation votes from the full Senate without risking rejection by the Judiciary Committee, Senate Majority Leader Thomas Daschle said Tuesday.

Republicans asked for such treatment during negotiations over how to reorganize the newly Democrat-controlled Senate. The GOP is afraid that Democrats would block Bush's judicial nominations and has been looking for a way to ensure Bush's top nominees will at least make it to the floor. Daschle opposes any guarantees for Bush nominees. "We will provide them an opportunity for the vote, but I would hope the Senate would show its common sense and would vote against that particular proposal," said Daschle, D-S.D.

The GOP originally asked for guaranteed Senate votes on all Supreme Court and federal appellate court nominees and elimination of the secret veto process for some judicial nominations, but Daschle refused. The Republicans then modified their request to guaranteed Supreme Court votes only.

Democrats control the Senate by a 50-49 margin. Sen. Jim Jeffords of Vermont threw the chamber to the Democrats when he defected from the Republican Party to become the Senate's sole independent.

Daschle said he would ask his party to vote against the provision when the Senate votes. "I expect we will prevail," he said.

Calls to Republican senators involved in the negotiations with Daschle were not returned. A senior GOP leadership aide described Daschle's agreement to a vote on how Supreme Court nominees will be handled as a step in the right direction.

Daschle agreed to another Republican request: to make the senatorial "blue-slip" veto process public instead of private, as it has been in the past. "We certainly oppose private blue slips, and I'm prepared to incorporate the public blue-slip policy in the organizing resolution itself," Daschle said.

While the Senate Judiciary Committee has never in modern history kept a Supreme Court nominee from coming to a vote, the resolution would render the committee powerless to stop a future Supreme Court nominee no matter what the controlling party thinks.

"In essence, what their proposal would do is to create a 100-member judiciary committee, bypassing, if they wish, the Judiciary Committee itself. We're not prepared to do that," Daschle said. "We think that, for this institution, for careful consideration of the nominees themselves, we ought to continue to maintain the Senate practice of insisting that all nominees be considered and voted upon in the Judiciary Committee."

The provisions would only be binding on Congress until January 2003. It would also be negated if Republicans were to take back control of the chamber, which would force senators to vote on a new organizing resolution.

Daschle said Democrats would insist that changes become a permanent part of the Senate process if they are approved. "This ought not be something we just do for this Congress," he said.

The Senate will vote on the Supreme Court provision, and on reorganizing the chamber, before they leave for the Independence Day holiday, Daschle said.

The two sides also agreed that Democrats will gain a one-seat majority on each Senate committee, and the size of committees will be expanded to accommodate the one-seat Democratic edge. All Republicans will keep their committee assignments, and committee finances and space agreements negotiated at the beginning of the year will continue in effect as well.

The Senate will not work on any of Bush's nominees until after those votes, the majority leader said.

Bush has not nominated anyone for the Supreme Court because there are no openings. He has made several lower court nominations.

Despite Appearances, Confirmation Process for Judicial Nominees Makes Progress

WASHINGTON -- Officially, the confirmation process for President George W. Bush's judicial nominees was stuck in limbo last week as Senate leaders haggled over the rules of engagement under the new Democratic majority. But beyond those negotiations, the judicial nomination process is moving ahead.

In Florida, Republican leaders have 70 lawyers to choose from -- including prominent names and relative unknowns -- in deciding whom to recommend to Bush for three federal judgeships and three U.S. attorney spots in the state.

The two vacant judgeships in the southern district drew the most applicants. But an open seat in the middle district attracted 19 candidates. The U.S. attorney spots in the northern, middle and southern districts drew 10, nine and eight applicants, respectively. Many applicants hedged their bets by applying for more than one position.

Gov. Jeb Bush, Rep. E. Clay Shaw Jr., R-Fla., and Rep. C.W. Young, R-Fla., will pick the finalists to recommend to the White House.

Back in Familiar Role, ABA Rates 6 Judicial Nominees

Jonathan Ringel

Six of President George W. Bush's nominees for the federal appeals courts have received "qualified" or "well qualified" ratings from the American Bar Association's standing committee on the federal judiciary. These are the first ratings to come from the ABA committee since President George W. Bush in March kicked the group out of its 48-year role prescreening potential judicial nominees for the White House.

The ABA saw its stock rise again with the switch to Democratic control of the Senate, and Senate Judiciary Chairman Patrick Leahy, D-Vt., has promised to consider the evaluations before commencing hearings on any individual nominee. The panel has so far given the highest ratings to three sitting district judges seeking elevation to their appeals courts, according to documents released by the Senate Judiciary Committee and other sources. The committee unanimously gave a "well qualified" rating to Judge Barrington Parker Jr. of the federal trial court in New York, nominated for a seat on the Second Circuit U.S. Court of Appeals. Parker, an African-American, was nominated to the district court in 1994 by then-President Bill Clinton.

A majority of the ABA panel gave Judge Edith Brown Clement of the federal trial court in New Orleans, nominated for the Fifth Circuit, a "well qualified" rating. A minority of the panel rated Clement "qualified," according to the documents, and one unidentified member of the panel abstained from voting. Clement was nominated to the trial court in 1991 by then-President George Bush.

A nominee to the Fourth Circuit, Judge Dennis Shedd of the federal trial court in Columbia, S.C., also received a majority "well qualified," minority " qualified" rating, according to a source. When Bush nominated him to his current seat in 1990, Shedd, a former staffer to Sen. Strom Thurmond, R-S.C., had received a mixed "qualified/not qualified" ABA rating, according to a press account from the time. Jeffrey Sutton, a Sixth Circuit nominee, received a majority "qualified," minority "well qualified" rating. Sutton, a partner in the Columbus, Ohio, office of Jones, Day, Reavis & Pogue, has successfully argued several Supreme Court cases on behalf of litigants challenging acts of Congress as overreaching, including parts of the Violence Against Women Act and the Americans With Disabilities Act.

Ohio Supreme Court Justice Deborah Cook, also named to the Sixth Circuit, was unanimously rated "qualified." Cook, on the state high court for six years, was strongly backed in her 2000 re-election race by the Ohio business community, but opposed by African-American and plaintiffs lawyer groups. The ABA panel was also unanimous in calling Fourth Circuit Judge Roger Gregory "qualified." Gregory was a Richmond litigator until late last year, when President Clinton, in a controversial move, named him to the Fourth Circuit while Congress was out of session. Bush's decision to renominate Gregory, who is the first African-American judge on the Fourth Circuit, was seen as an attempt to mollify Democrats poised to block his nominees. A senior Bush administration official said the ratings "reaffirm the choice of these candidates as ones of high competence and integrity."

The ABA is expected to issue ratings shortly on the five other judicial nominees the president announced in May, including appellate advocates Miguel Estrada and John Roberts Jr. for the D.C. Circuit; North Carolina federal Judge Terrence Boyle for the Fourth Circuit; Texas high court Justice Priscilla Owen for the Fifth Circuit; and University of Utah law professor Michael McConnell for the 10th Circuit. President Bush has since nominated five others to circuit court posts, and three to district court posts. He announced Monday that he intends to nominate Magistrate Judge Terry Wooten to the U.S. district court in South Carolina.

The ABA panel conducts dozens of interviews with lawyers, judges and others regarding each nominee, evaluates the nominees' qualifications with regard to integrity, professional competence and judicial temperament, and hands out one of three ratings: "well qualified," "qualified," and "not qualified." The committee consists of one member from each of 12 federal judicial circuits, two from the huge Ninth Circuit and a chairwoman, Patricia Hynes of Milberg, Weiss, Bershad, Hynes & Lerach. Ever since the ABA committee gave mixed ratings to Republican Supreme Court nominees Robert Bork (the majority found him "well qualified" while the minority said he was "not qualified") and Clarence Thomas (the majority said " qualified," the minority "not qualified"), the committee has come under strong criticism from conservatives.

In March, the Bush administration removed the group from its formal role. White House Counsel Alberto Gonzales said at the time that the president did not want to give the ABA a

"preferential" role above other groups that could weigh in on the judiciary. Liberal groups decried the decision for removing an important peer review from the process and said it was a sign that Bush was trying to ease the way to push the judiciary to the right. Leahy would not comment on individual nominees Monday, according to a spokesman. Leahy has said he expects to hold hearings on nominees about two weeks after the Senate leadership completes reorganization negotiations.

Bush Wants Cassell as Judge

Lee Davidson

WASHINGTON -- President Bush has nominated University of Utah law professor Paul G. Cassell to become a judge in the U.S. District Court for Utah.

If confirmed by the Senate, Cassell would replace retired Judge David Sam.

Cassell, who was nominated Tuesday, is considered an expert on victims rights. He represented relatives of victims of the Oklahoma City bombing who wanted to attend the trial of Timothy McVeigh but had been excluded by a judge's order.

While he initially lost the case seeking to allow them to attend, he turned to Congress and helped push through a victims-rights bill in two weeks that forced the judge to allow their attendance.

"The judicial system would be a much better place if we had more Paul Cassells and Judge (Richard) Matschs (who refused to block McVeigh's execution)," said Marsha Kight, with the National Organization for Victims Assistance. Her daughter, Frankie Merrell, was killed in the Oklahoma City bombing.

"He'll make an excellent judge," she said, praising Cassell's representation of her and other relatives of Oklahoma City bombing victims.

Calls to Cassell and the law school for comment on his nomination were not immediately returned.

Cassell also argued but lost a high-profile case before the Supreme Court seeking to allow some confessions to stand even if police failed to give "Miranda" warnings telling those interrogated that they have the right to remain silent.

Cassell, 41, has been a professor of law at the University of Utah since 1992.

He was an assistant U.S. attorney in the Eastern District of Virginia from 1988-91, and was an associate deputy U.S. attorney general from 1986-88.

Cassell was a law clerk for Warren E. Burger, former chief justice of the United States, from 1985-86. He was also a clerk for Antonin Scalia (now a U.S. Supreme Court justice) when he was a judge on the U.S. District Court of Appeals in Washington, D.C.

Cassell received his law degree from Stanford University in 1984, and received his bachelor's degree there in 1979.

He was admitted to the bar in Pennsylvania in 1986 and to the Utah bar in 1992.

Cassell is the second University of Utah law professor to be nominated by Bush for a judgeship. Michael W. McConnell was nominated to the Denver-based 10th Circuit Court of Appeals. His nomination is also pending before the Senate Judiciary Committee.

Utah Law Professor Nominated for Federal Bench

Paul Foy

President Bush has nominated University of Utah law professor Paul Cassell to replace U.S. District Court Judge David Sam.

Cassell, 42, is a conservative legal scholar who has criticized the aggressive federal prosecution of Salt Lake's Olympic bid leaders.

He also is a victims' rights advocate who argued before the U.S. Supreme Court last year that some criminal confessions should stand even when police fail to give suspects the Miranda warning on their right to remain silent. The court disagreed.

Cassell was an assistant U.S. attorney in the Eastern District of Virginia from 1988-91, and associate deputy U.S. attorney general from 1986-88.

He was sponsored by Sen. Orrin Hatch, R-Utah, for the federal bench and nominated by President Bush on Tuesday.

"It's obviously a great opportunity to serve on the bench and I'm honored the president has put my name forward," Cassell said Wednesday in San Diego, Calif., where he was vacationing with his wife and three children.

If confirmed by the U.S. Senate, Cassell would take on the full-time vacancy opened in Utah in late 1999 when Sam went on senior, semiretired status. Sam will continue to handle some cases and has been assigned to preside over the Olympic bribery trial of Salt Lake bid chief Tom Welch and his deputy, Dave Johnson. The trial is set to begin July 16.

Cassell's nomination to the bench silenced his often provocative critique of the government's case. He was no apologist for Welch and Johnson, but Cassell argued the U.S. Justice Department devised elaborate conspiracy, fraud and racketeering theories when simpler charges would suffice.

Welch and Johnson were indicted by a federal grand jury on charges of conspiring over a decade to bribe the International Olympic Committee by plying its members with $1 million in cash, scholarships, travel, medical care and excessive gifts. The defendants maintain they did nothing criminally wrong or different from other bid cities.

Cassell doesn't expect to handle any aspect of the Olympic case. He would take one of five full-time positions at the U.S. District Court for Utah, which has been understaffed for a year. Each judge handles about 100 criminal and 300 civil cases a year.

Sam, 67, handles about half of the usual caseload of full-time judges as a semi-retired judge.

Cassell represented families of victims of the Oklahoma City bombing who were initially barred from attending the trial of Timothy McVeigh, who was executed June 11.

He helped usher a victims' rights bill through Congress that forced the judge in the McVeigh case to make room for the victims' relatives at trial.

"He'll make an excellent judge," Marsha Kight, whose daughter was killed in the blast, told the Deseret News.

Cassell was a law clerk for former Supreme Court Chief Justice Warren E. Burger from 1985-86. He served as clerk to Antonin Scalia, now a Supreme Court justice, when Scalia was on the U.S. District Court of Appeals in Washington, D.C.

Cassell received bachelor's and law degrees from Stanford University and was admitted to the Pennsylvania bar in 1986 and the Utah bar in 1992.

He is the second University of Utah law professor to be nominated by Bush for a judgeship. Michael W. McConnell's nomination to the Denver-based 10th Circuit Court of Appeals is pending before the Senate Judiciary Committee.

Ready to Rumble

Byron York

In coming weeks, Democrats on the Senate Judiciary Committee plan to hold a series of hearings which they say will help clarify the issues involved in the judicial-confirmation process - and which Republicans believe will serve to establish a legal and political basis for rejecting George W. Bush's nominees for federal judgeships.

Next Tuesday, New York Democrat Charles Schumer, the new chairman of the Subcommittee on Administrative Oversight and the Courts, will hold a hearing entitled, "Should Ideology Matter? Judicial Nominations 2001." Next month, according to Senate sources, committee chairman Patrick Leahy will hold hearings to discuss the Rehnquist Court, federal jurisprudence, and conservative judicial activism.

Republicans believe the hearings will amount to a one-two punch against Bush's nominees. The Schumer session will establish that it is acceptable to oppose nominees solely on ideological grounds, and the Leahy hearing will suggest that Bush's nominees hold views that are dangerously out of touch with those of most Americans. The end result will be the conclusion that Democrats are justified in voting against the president's nominees, even if they seem well-qualified to hold office.

Democrats deny that there is any overarching strategy at work. "Basically, the senator wants to take a look at how we should view the process for confirming judges," says Schumer spokesman Bradley Tusk. "What role should ideology play? I think there's some confusion on how we should deal with the issue."

Nevertheless, the witness lists for the hearings are likely to be tilted in favor of the emerging Democratic consensus that senators can legitimately vote against judges on the basis of ideology alone. In the past, senators who disagreed with a nominee's judicial philosophy have often been forced to search for a disqualifying flaw on which they could base their opposition, while steadfastly maintaining that ideology had nothing to do with it.

For example, in the 1987 fight over the Supreme Court nomination of Robert Bork, wrote the Washington Post's E.J. Dionne in an influential recent column, "Liberals couldn't simply oppose Bork. To block him, they had to trash him." Now, Dionne continued, Democrats are "no longer shilly-shallying. They're saying, right from the start, that they'll oppose judicial nominees on philosophical grounds alone."

Republicans have gotten the message. "They're laying the groundwork," one GOP aide says of the Democrats' plans. "They're trying to paint all of our judges as right-wing extremists who are here to turn back the clock on civil rights. To be mainstream and moderate, therefore, they have to stop them."

Meanwhile, as Schumer and Leahy plan their hearings, the work of actually confirming the president's nominees has ground to a halt. No hearings have been scheduled for the confirmation of any of the nearly two-dozen nominees so far announced by the White House.

Organizing Talks Go On, But Daschle Readies For Showdown

Senate Majority Leader Daschle could bring up a new organizational resolution for the Senate as early as this week--a move that could allow committees to function normally, while putting an end to weeks of contentious negotiations. Nevertheless, Daschle and a team of GOP negotiators continued to exchange communications Tuesday--a sign that a chance remained for the two sides to broker a final deal and avoid a partisan fight on the Senate floor.

Daschle told reporters that he would bring up a resolution this week that reflects areas on which Republicans and Democrats can agree, while allowing Republicans to offer amendments to address their concerns about moving judicial nominees. But a team of GOP negotiators met in Minority Leader Lott's office Tuesday evening to prepare yet another Republican offer for Daschle.

"I think we're sending him something that will be worthy of consideration," said Sen. Pete Domenici, R-N.M. Said Sen. Phil Gramm, R-Texas; "The whole thing might be avoided. We might have an agreement." Gramm downplayed the idea of a GOP filibuster to block an organizing resolution.

Daschle addressed reporters after meeting with his Democratic colleagues to describe an earlier offer from the GOP negotiating team on the organizing resolution. He said the Democratic Caucus was "disappointed" in the GOP offer, adding, "My five Republican colleagues have chosen to terminate the negotiations."

Daschle said he had hoped to avoid a partisan floor fight over the organizing resolution. Nevertheless, allowing a vote on the GOP proposals would give Republicans something they had been seeking in talks with Daschle last week.

Daschle rejected GOP demands for a "guarantee" that judicial nominations would come to a vote, saying such an approach "undermines" the Senate.

"What they want is a 100-member Judiciary Committee, [and] we're not prepared to do that," Daschle said.

Other Democrats echoed that sentiment at the Tuesday meeting of their Caucus.

"I don't know of a self-respecting member of a committee who would tolerate bypassing their committee," said Sen. Christopher Dodd, D-Conn. Daschle said he had asked Lott to offer specific proposals on the two issues Republicans raised, and he expected Democrats had the votes to head off the GOP proposal. "My guess is it would be pretty much a party-line vote," said a Democratic aide.

Daschle said Democrats were willing to accept a GOP proposal to make public the "blue slip" process--by which a single senator can block action on a judicial nominee. He noted that Sen. Richard Durbin, D-Ill., proposed such a move in 1997, only to draw opposition from then-Judiciary Chairman Hatch.

"I just hope they would support this for future Congresses, not just this Congress," Daschle said of Republicans. The Democratic aide said Republicans "made clear" that they would not filibuster the organizing resolution if they received votes on their proposals. Dodd said if Republicans decided to hold up the Senate's business over the organizing resolution, "you open yourself up to looking terribly petty."

Another Democratic aide said preparations were under way for Majority Whip Reid to move into the choice office space now occupied by Minority Whip Nickles. Republicans and Democrats have said they generally agree on issues of staff, office space and a one-seat Democratic majority on committees, all of which are also in the organizing resolution.

The negotiations over Senate organization took place behind the scenes as Daschle struggled to bring managed care legislation to the floor despite GOP objections (see related article, page 12).

The Senate reached a unanimous consent agreement late Tuesday to schedule a vote on a motion to proceed to the bill Thursday morning. Daschle had indicated earlier in the day that he would file a cloture motion on the bill if a UC could not be reached. Daschle said it was important for the Senate to complete managed care legislation before the July Fourth recess, while also mentioning an FY01 defense supplemental appropriations bill--in order to leave the rest of July available to move appropriations bills.

Senate Republicans had objected to a Democratic motion to proceed to the patients' rights bill, and Daschle indicated he was prepared to file a cloture motion Tuesday that would lead to a cloture vote Thursday.

Amid signs of GOP foot-dragging, Daschle also threatened to cut into the precious July Fourth recess to complete action on the managed care bill. "I'll see you for the fireworks on the Fourth," Daschle told reporters. Republicans warned they were in no hurry to rush through that measure.

"Washington, D.C., is a very interesting place on July Fourth," said Nickles, who added, "Whether we're in for a couple of days [during the planned break] is irrelevant." But Nickles stressed that Republicans would do battle over the substance of the bill and had "no intention of filibustering this bill."

Still, Lott has not ruled out the possibility of a filibuster to block the measure. Republicans objected to a motion to proceed to the bill, on the grounds that they had not been given a chance to review changes made to the legislation last week.

Sen. Judd Gregg, R-N.H., said Daschle had been "a bit autocratic" in his decision to bring up the bill, adding, "I think we need a couple of days to talk about what the bill is."

Daschle laughed off GOP charges that the legislation had been secretly rewritten, saying he was bringing up the same bill listed on the Senate calendar.

Daschle and Reid stressed that the Senate would work through the July Fourth recess if necessary to complete work on the patients' rights bill. But, under those circumstances, Daschle said the chamber would be off July Fourth for the day.

Picking Judges: Democrats Should Stand Their Ground
Edward Lazarus

With the power shift on Capitol Hill, the issue of how the Senate should approach President Bush's judicial nominations has moved to center stage. Both sides already have staked out positions on the substantive question of what standards senators should use in evaluating Bush's picks for the federal bench.

Echoing the theme of Democrats when Clinton's nominees were pending, Republicans now argue that the Senate should confirm all "qualified" nominees (based on their credentials) regardless of ideology. Meanwhile, Democrats, borrowing the GOP tune of the past eight years, respond that the Senate has an obligation to reject ideological "extremists."

Both responses are confused and inadequate. The GOP approach is wrongheaded, because a judicial nominee's ideology cannot be separated from his qualifications. On the contrary, ideology is an inevitable part of a nominee's suitability for the federal bench.

For their part, the Democrats are wrong to suggest that ideologically conservative nominees are "extremist." Generally speaking, Bush's nominees, even the very conservative ones, are mainstream participants in the contemporary debate over how judges should interpret the Constitution.

Twisting the record of nominees in order to cast them as extremists is both destructive and unnecessary. Every senator, Democrat and Republican alike, has a duty to assess a nominee's judicial values and methods against his or her own standard for how judges should interpret the Constitution and federal law. And every senator has the right to reject a nominee for the simple reason that the senator believes the nominee's approach to legal issues to be importantly wrong -- even if not extremist.

Our legal culture is riven into two factions. Basically, the "liberals" would preserve Roe v. Wade and affirmative action, support a rigorous separation of church and state, are skeptical of the death penalty, and believe that the Constitution vests broad power in the federal government even at the expense of states' rights. Legal "conservatives" hold diametrically opposite views.

As a candidate, Bush promised that adherence to the conservative side of this debate – the side embodied by Justices Antonin Scalia and Clarence Thomas -- would be an essential qualification for nomination to the federal bench. As president, Bush has redeemed this promise.

Taking the advice of very conservative advisers, Bush has selected a core group of highly credentialed, conservative ideologues for placement on those appellate courts (such as the 6th, 10th and D.C. circuits) that are closely divided between liberals and conservatives. On these battleground circuits, a single new judge might tip the political balance of an appellate court to the conservative side. Meanwhile, Bush carefully assigned his more moderate nominees to circuits that are so overwhelmingly liberal or conservative that the views of one new appointee will have little impact.

This clever strategy is not inappropriate. In presidential elections, voters choose one candidate over another in part because they believe he will nominate judges who share a certain vision of the Constitution and the proper judicial role. American history is replete with examples of presidents seeking to perpetuate their legacies by filling the judiciary with like-minded judges.

By the same token, however, Democratic senators owe a duty to their constituents to refuse confirmation on the same overtly ideological grounds. If our divided government is any measure, the nation as a whole is evenly split between the liberal and conservative approaches to constitutional law. And it thus is incumbent on Senate Democrats to ensure that the federal courts -- the independent third branch of government -- reflect the nation's profound ambivalence.

This principle should apply to even the best of Bush's ideological nominees -- at the moment, Michael McConnell, Bush's selection for the U.S. Court of Appeals for the 10th Circuit (which presides over federal cases in Colorado, Kansas, New Mexico, Oklahoma, Utah and Wyoming).

McConnell's credentials are impressive. He has distinguished himself as a constitutional law scholar and has handled numerous important constitutional law cases. Those who know him, including liberals, say his temperament is suited to being a judge.

But from a Democratic perspective, McConnell is also profoundly wrong in his approach to the Constitution. First, he is (like Robert Bork) an adherent of the school of constitutional thought that asserts judges should interpret the Constitution according to the "original intent" of the Framers.

As was shown in the Bork hearings, this approach is irremediably flawed. Divining the Framers' intent is usually impossible (for one thing, the various Framers were rarely of one mind). Moreover, experience with Scalia, Thomas and other originalist practitioners shows that their search for original intent is little more than a cloak conservative judges use to dress up their value-laden decisions in the neutral garb of historical inquiry.

On specific issues, although McConnell may not be on record opposing Roe v. Wade, his originalist approach is antithetical to Roe and makes his opposition a foregone conclusion. McConnell is very much on record, moreover, on another hot-button issue: An avowed fundamentalist Christian, he is arguably the legal world's leading advocate for lowering the wall of separation between church and state.

None of these views -- which many conservatives share -- makes McConnell an extremist. Indeed, McConnell is more moderate than most conservatives on some issues. At bottom, though, McConnell follows a deeply troubled methodology to reach deeply troubling conclusions. And that is grounds enough for rejecting him.

In short, Democratic senators have the right -- and even a duty -- to force the administration into a compromise on judicial nominations so that the federal courts, now evenly balanced, will continue to reflect the close division in the electorate at large. Such a compromise might involve jointly identifying judicial moderates (a rare breed) or taking turns in choosing judges for the battleground circuit courts. But in the meantime, Democrats should honestly and without apology have the courage of their convictions. They should just say no. Doing Business in the Senate

The organizing process undertaken by the Senate every two years usually occurs with little fuss. But with a newly constituted Senate now in Democratic control, what used to be a routine housekeeping chore has become a focus of partisan impasse. Republicans are demanding a ban on a parliamentary tactic employed in the past to block some judicial nominations, and they are seeking guarantees that all Supreme Court nominations will be brought to the Senate floor, even if they are rejected in committee. This is a case that can be resolved with some good will. Democrats should give in on one but not both the Republican requests.

The irony, not to say audacity, of the Republican demands is striking. For the six years that Republicans controlled the Senate, they routinely obstructed President Bill Clinton's judicial nominations, often refusing even to hold hearings or a vote in the Judiciary Committee. This page deplored such tactics, so the Democrats' pledge to hold hearings and votes in committee is most welcome. Another tactic used by the Republicans was the so-called "blue slip," in which a senator from the home state of a judicial nominee could anonymously block that nominee from being considered. Despite using that tactic in the past, Republicans are now demanding that any senator using the blue slip be identified. The demand is no doubt galling to Democrats, but they should nevertheless accept it.
Senators who block a nomination from their home state should have the courage to do so publicly.

A separate demand by the Republicans is less worthy of approval. They are asking for a change in Senate rules that would require any nomination for the Supreme Court to be sent to the full Senate even if it is rejected in committee. The fact is that, except for one historical oddity when there was a nomination for a seat that was not yet vacant, neither Republicans nor Democrats can find a case in which a Supreme Court nomination was not submitted to the full Senate. The nominations for Supreme Court of Robert Bork and Clarence Thomas were both voted on by the Senate, even though Mr. Bork was rejected by a majority in committee and Judge Thomas got a tie vote.

Tom Daschle, the Senate majority leader, has promised that the Democrats will give full and fair consideration to all judicial nominations. Citing the Bork and Thomas precedents, he has indicated that he fully expects Supreme Court nominations to be treated as in the past.

Senate rules have for many decades empowered committees to vet nominations and decide whether to approve them. Changing the rules now would undermine the power of the committee at just the time when its new chairman, Patrick Leahy of Vermont, has promised to process the nominations in an evenhanded, open fashion. The Republicans should take him at his word and not try to force an artificial arrangement just because they fear the Democrats will behave as badly as the Republicans did under President Clinton. Above all, Republicans should not be trying to block the Senate from proceeding with its business by demanding arbitrary new rules of the Democrats.

Julie Samuels

As Democrats and Republicans work out a new power-sharing deal in the Senate, the issue of judicial nominees remains a major point of contention. With Democrats controlling the agenda, will President Bush's nominees even get confirmation hearings? Will the Republicans make committee assignments if they don't?

National Journal.com's Julie Samuels spoke with Kent Markus, former counselor to Clinton Attorney General Janet Reno and a onetime judicial nominee himself, about the process, the lack of judges on today's federal bench and how this might all play out in the Democratic-led Senate.

Q. Briefly walk me through the process of your nomination and the experience you had as an example of how the process works -- or maybe doesn't always work. Well, mine was a nomination for a federal appellate court, and I think already it's worth mentioning that the process is quite radically different for the appellate courts as compared with the district courts. Because the appellate court selections are primarily managed, controlled, decided by the White House and the Justice Department, mostly the White House, whereas the district court appointments are pretty much decided by local officials in the state in which the opening exists, usually the United States senators....And so, because we were talking about an appellate court position, mine was mostly a conversation that was taking place among Washington folk. I learned -- through a friend -- that [Judge] Dave Nelson on the 6th Circuit had sent a letter in to the Justice Department indicating an intention some months later to take senior status. That triggered the whole discussion. This was in the mid- to late summer of 1999. The friend at Justice called and said, "You know, we've got this letter, are you interested in the seat?" And I said, "Yes, I'm very interested in the seat."

That began a process of trying to persuade various critical decision makers that I was the right person to be nominated for that seat. I think to the extent that anyone suggests that this is a process -- for any of these court positions -- that you get a call one day from some official calling you to public service because they've researched the backgrounds of all conceivable candidates and determined that you are by far the most worthy isn't telling you the truth. I mean, I don't know anybody who's been involved in any of these conversations that doesn't engage, even though it may be sort of an awkward word to use in this context, in something resembling a campaign to obtain one of these appointments. I think people like to pretend it's substantially more gentile than that, but it isn't. So, I undertook efforts to have various people communicate simultaneously with both the White House and Justice Department and especially key decision makers there that I would be a good nominee for the spot. And these were all people that knew me. I had worked as Attorney General [Janet] Reno's counselor at the Justice Department -- the highest-ranking staff-adviser to the attorney general, so I knew almost everybody who was being communicated with, and yet it still was a process you have to go through to persuade them that, among other conceivable nominees, you're the right one.

At the same time, I was also trying to make sure that, because I had two United States senators from the opposite political party here in Ohio, that were I able to persuade the White House that this was the way to go, that the United States senators were not going to be opposed to my selection. And so there was a similar effort going with Senator [George] Voinovich and even more particularly Senator [Mike] DeWine, since he was senior senator from Ohio and on the Judiciary Committee....And then... nothing happened for a while. And then there was delay and delay and delay, and I would talk to friends who were involved in the weekly meetings at the White House -- "Did the seat come up for discussion this week?"; "No, we didn't get to it, we didn't talk about it"; "Oh, it got mentioned and so-and-so said they heard from so-and-so about you" -- and I sort of would get little bits and scraps and pieces and, you know, my reaction was, "Jeez, I'm peculiarly well-connected, as compared to many people going through this, and still, I can only get little bits and scraps and pieces of information about what's going on and is there really a delay for some substantial reason, that there's a concern about whether I'm the right nominee and they're looking at others, or is it just that other matters are taking a higher priority, or what's going on?"

Just as magically, at some point it finally breaks, and that took until about December. And it was in, if I recall, the third week of December that I finally got the call from the White House saying, "We intend to proceed with your nomination, assuming that everything's OK."

At that point you then begin a much more cumbersome process where you are provided an extraordinary set of forms and questionnaires -- one for the White House, one for the FBI, one for the Justice Department, one for the Senate and Judiciary Committee and one for the administrative office of the courts.... The moment they say "go," in terms of putting together the forms and submitting them, the hurry-up-and-wait process then becomes another hurry-up process because they then, once they've made the decision, want you to get everything in as quickly as you possibly can so that it can be scrutinized and a final determination can be made as to whether you are in fact going to be nominated or whether all these materials and background checks will reveal some problem....

So, you're going nuts trying to put all of this together and get it in. Simultaneously, as soon as you get it in, not only does it trigger the White House own internal evaluation of everything and the FBI check to make sure you're not a drug dealer or you're not beating your spouse or whatever, but that the [American Bar Association] check then began. And they have their own whole process, where they not only interview you, but they interviewed a wide range of people in your legal community and others about you and your integrity and your experience and your knowledge of the law and all those kind of things, for their rating process.... So, you go through with that whole process -- and that all went on from about the third week in December -- in what in this context was considered very speedy – to a nomination on February 9....

From that point, the goal was obviously to seek and obtain a hearing and get a positive confirmation vote and then get a vote of the full Senate with respect to confirmation. One of the critical intermediary steps to be getting such a hearing was, and to this day still remains much in the news, the blue slips returned from your two home-state senators.

I had two Republican senators, and the White House had expressed some skepticism about whether I was going to be able to get two blue slips returned, and I think, in the end, I was the only court of appeals nominee in the country who had blue slips returned by two home-state Republican senators, both saying: "We have no objection to this nominee. You can go ahead and hold hearings if you chose to." But, again, that took time and persuasion and encouragement and there were editorials in the newspapers across the state encouraging the senators to not let this position remain open... and finally Senators Voinovich and DeWine both returned their blue slips to [then Senate Judiciary Committee] Chairman [Orrin] Hatch, [R-Utah], which was yet another critical hurdle covered.... Then it was a whole lobbying process of -- in the election year and in the context in which there was clearly a desire by many to simply say: " Look, we're just not going to confirm people this year, especially court of appeals nominees. Let's hold these seats open, see if we win the White House, and if we do, we get to fill those seats rather than the other guys."

And, in the end, that's exactly what happened to me and lots and lots of other people, and it wasn't even -- I think, to my knowledge -- anything that was focused on any substantial way on me personally. It was just a relatively across-the-board decision among the majority in the Senate... and the strategy paid off.

Q. What do you think about the blue-slip process? A. I don't think it's a good process, and I am one of the people who was not a victim of it. There were others like me who were awaiting confirmation hearings, [and] that was the hurdle they couldn't get across.... I actually had hoped, and the White House had hoped, that being in the somewhat extraordinary position of having two Republican senators return blue slips for a Democratic nominee, might have been enough to break through. And it even might have been something that Hatch could have used as an excuse to say, "Look, I'm not a terrible bad guy, here's a guy who got blue slips returned by his two Republican senators and we moved and proceeded to a hearing on him." That still didn't do it for me.

Even though I wasn't the victim of the process, at least at that point, I just think that it's an inappropriate prerogative, and that's all it is. It's a prerogative that's afforded the individual senators, and I think that I'd rather have... a more deliberative process where we look at candidates, we make a decision, and vote them up or down. I think the big unfortunate part is I think the reason there's such a reluctance to give up that prerogative is that it's substantially politically easier to simply to have nothing happen than to vote against.

Q. It sounded like the longest delay you faced was from the end of September to December. I was curious as to where you think these delays tend to come from.
A. I think they come from everywhere. I think they come -- in terms of the White House decision making -- I do think they come primarily from a combination of managing competing objectives and competing interests and competing candidates and all of that playing out in the decision making. And the general state of affairs that I experienced at high levels of the Justice Department and that I saw at high levels of the White House is you never have time to do all the things you're supposed to be doing.

And so even things that are objectively reasonably important matters suddenly become not terribly important compared to other things that are much more important.... I think when you combine that bureaucratic aspect to it with the political aspect of having to decide among competing candidates, those combine in a nefarious way to result in a delay...

Q. In a broader sense, how do you think the process changed after the 1987 Robert Bork hearings, if it did change at all?

A. I think in general that was a contributor to a sense of a need for tit-for-tat paybacks for actual and perceived slights by both parties. I think it's actually consistent with changes in the Congress that have absolutely nothing to do with nominations. My perception, throughout the '90s, is that Congress became a substantially less civil place, that there was substantially less accommodation that took place among members.... It became a substantially more partisan place. It became a meaner place. I think that was just one aspect and one manifestation of it that had an impact, particularly on nominees.

Q. Do you personally think that a nominee who might be seen as too idealistic is qualified to sit on a federal bench?

A. Depends on what you mean by "too idealistic." ... I think quite clearly being idealistic alone is not disqualifying. I think the critical question in addition to standard qualifying questions... is "What is your view of the role of a judge?" You can be as ideological as you want to be if you don't have any intent or desire to try to foist your own ideological perspective upon the system through your position as a judge. That is, whatever your privately-held views are, so what? -- if you don't seek to impose those views from the bench.... I am not particularly enamored with judges who substantially invade the purview of the legislative branch, and that's something that is loosely referred to as being activist. Unfortunately, I think that term has become very politically charged and one of those terms that's come to mean whatever anybody wants it to mean. But, I think historically, I think it's how much restraint the judge demonstrates vis-à-vis the operations of the other branches, and I think that I'm very uncomfortable with the amount of activism -- with the amount of invasion of the legislative and executive branches -- we're seeing on the judiciary right now.... If someone is highly ideological but also has a very limited and constricted view of the role of judge, I don't have a problem with that person. I have a problem with them if they are highly ideological, and they're on a mission to effectuate that ideology once they get on the bench.

Q. As far as ABA ratings go, I'd like to talk about those for a second because, especially since the power switch -- when Bush first came into office, he said "we aren't going to use them," and then the Democrats came into the majority, and they said, "well, now we are..."

A. And I think even before the power switch the Democrats had said, "you may not be going to use them, but we still want them...." And they had made pretty clear that they were going to wait for an ABA recommendation before they were going to be willing to schedule hearings with regards to candidates who had been nominated. So that, even before the power switch, the effect would have been that the White House would not have had the advantage of information about the ABA's views and ratings before finalizing the nomination decision. They would have finalized their nomination decision and then learned about what the ABA's view is, which I thought was a little risky on their behalf.

That's if they cared one wit about what the ABA said, which apparently they didn't. And so, I think that this power switch has only heightened that a little bit more, which has given Democrats the ability to say: "Look, we really mean that. We're not proceeding with the nominations until we know what the ABA says. And now we control the committee schedule, and we're going to wait for that."

Q. So the role that they're going to play has not changed?

A. I think it's only changed in... timing. It no longer is being used as an element of the White House decision making as to whether to proceed with a contemplated nomination. Instead, the recommendation will come out after the White House decides to make a nomination and will be used primarily in the context of making confirmation decisions.

Q. Right now, there's more than 100 judicial vacancies in the federal court system, which is the most since 1997. How serious of a problem is that?

A. There's a serious problem with respect to the delay, and, in the most cliché of ways, you really have a "justice delayed is justice denied" phenomenon going on. Even while my nomination was pending for the 6th Circuit, and that's now eight, nine months ago when I was involved with these conversations still, the 6th Circuit was a great example. It had become because of the number of vacancies that existed then, the slowest circuit in the country -- the time of argument to the time of decision, with cases averaging in excess of two years to get a decision out of the appeals court. That's crazy. And since that time, there are additional vacancies on the 6th Circuit.

So the suggestions that we can stand to have continuing delays in the fillings of these positions I think is wrong. And I think that the Democrats on the Judiciary Committee are in an awkward position.... They might like to engage in more tit-for-tat; they're angry about what was done to some of the nominees in the Clinton administration. They also full-well recognize that it is just not good for the country and for the system to continue to delay in filling these positions.

Q. As far as the power shift goes, how do you see that affecting the nominating process?

A. I think it's undeniable that it's going to slow it down. I hope that it does not go to a stall, a delay, a blockage. Again, I just think that's wrong. And maybe I'm more acutely cognizant of that having been a victim of that, but I just think it's not good for the court, it's not good for the country, it's not good for litigants, it's not good for the Congress -- it makes them look bad -- and it's terribly, terribly unfair to the nominees....

Q. Do you think it will change the nominees that come out of the White House?

A. I think it will. [Rep.] Chris Cox, [R-Calif., who recently withdrew his name from consideration] is already an example of that. I think there was a recognition that while [Republicans] controlled the committee, they have an ability to push a little harder with respect to getting people through. Look at the Ted Olson [for solicitor general] vote -- there was a lot of reluctance and grumbling, but it went through, and Ted was confirmed. I think that's a different dynamic now.... When the Republicans controlled the committee, they could make Democrats vote against nominees. When the Democrats are controlling the committee, they can make it so they don't have to vote against the nominees because they can make it so the nominee never comes up for a vote.

Q. How do you see the power shift changing potential Supreme Court justice nominees, should there be any?

A. Same way.... More ability on the Democrats to insist on a more moderate nominee, more ability to insist on whatever a time they need to be adequate for scrutiny. I mean, it's an agenda-controlling power, and that process impact has a substance impact.

Q. Do you expect to see a similar situation at the end of a Bush term, or a Bush administration? Do you expect to see nominees left hanging, as you were?

A. I think there will be nominees left hanging at the end of every administration. And there have been, if you look historically, some number of nominees left hanging at the end of every administration. I think the thing that was discouraging and problematic about 2000 was that the slow-down in confirming nominees began much, much earlier than it ever had historically and the sort of line-in-the-sand decision by the majority at that time, that no more, especially no more appellate court nominees, were going to get through, came much earlier.... So that it was more and earlier and the thing I worry about -- and I worry about the Democrats doing it, too -- is saying, "fine, you did it more and earlier, we'll do it even more and even more earlier." We start slowing down after the first year in the administration? You know, the president's president for four years, and while I recognize that inevitably you are going to have political things that are going to result in some nominees being left hanging, especially those nominated late, very late, in the administration, a few months left, I actually think that President Bush's suggestion during the campaign was a pretty good one if it could be done as a practical matter. That unless there's a specific, individual reason not to do so, every nominee ought to have a hearing and a vote within 60 days.

Q. What do you think could be done to expedite the process?

A. At the nomination stage, there's cautiousness on the part of the White House as the nominating entity to do everything they can to avoid political embarrassment from nominating somebody who has some stain on their background, and they want to avoid that by finding out everything they possibly can about that nominee in advance, so that if there is something there they don't like, they can decide, "well then, we're not going to nominate that person." But that causes extraordinary delay and is highly intrusive sort of well beyond what I think anybody would think was rational or normal. And it's all about political defense on the part of the nominating entity. And the same thing that goes on with respect to the confirmation process is that -- and that's more I think on political offense -- people are attacked and are charicaturized and defined in very simplistic terms because that's politically convenient to do and may appeal to interest groups and others in a way that is terribly unfair and dangerous to nominees...

Q. Is there anything else you'd like to discuss?

A. I went back... and I pulled a column that I had read from the Washington Post on April 1 -- I think it was intended as an April Fool's Day column. Because there was a line in it that I remembered... where the guy writing the story says: "The nomination system is a national disgrace. It encourages bullies and emboldens demagogues, silences the voices of responsibility, and nourishes the lowest forms of partisan combat. It uses innocent citizens as pawns in politicians' petty games and stains the reputations of good people. It routinely violates fundamental democratic principles, undermines the quality and consistency of public management, and breaches simple decency." And I remember, when I read it originally, I went, "Yeah, that's right."

Democrats Must Demand Fair Split Among Judges

Edward Lazarus

With the power shift on Capitol Hill, the issue of how the Senate should approach President George W. Bush's judicial nominations takes center stage. Both parties have staked out positions on the question of what standards senators should use in evaluating Bush's picks for the federal bench. Echoing the theme of Democrats when former President Bill Clinton's nominees were pending, Republicans now argue that the Senate should confirm all "qualified" nominees regardless of ideology.

Meanwhile, Democrats, borrowing the GOP tune of the past eight years, respond that the Senate has an obligation to reject "extremists." Both responses are inadequate. The GOP approach is wrongheaded, because a judicial nominee's ideology cannot be separated from his qualifications. Ideology is an inevitable part of a nominee's suitability for the federal bench. For their part, the Democrats are wrong to suggest that ideologically conservative nominees are "extremist." Generally speaking, Bush's nominees, even the very conservative ones, are mainstream participants in the contemporary debate over how judges should interpret the Constitution.

Twisting nominees' records to cast them as extremists is destructive and unnecessary. Every senator, Democrat and Republican alike, has a duty to assess a nominee's judicial values and methods against his or her standard for how judges should interpret the Constitution and federal law. Every senator has the right to reject a nominee for the simple reason that the senator believes the nominee's approach to legal issues to be importantly wrong-even if not extremist. Our legal culture has two factions. Basically, the "liberals" would support nominees who would preserve Roe vs. Wade and affirmative action, support a rigorous separation of church and state, be skeptical of the death penalty and believe the Constitution vests broad power in the federal government even at the expense of states' rights.

Legal "conservatives" hold diametrically opposite views. As a candidate, Bush promised that adherence to the conservative side of this debate-the side embodied by Justices Antonin Scalia and Clarence Thomas-would be an essential qualification for nomination to the federal bench. Taking the advice of conservative advisers, Bush has selected a core group of highly credentialed, conservative ideologues for appellate courts (such as the Sixth, 10th and D.C. circuits) that are closely divided between liberals and conservatives.

On these battleground circuits, a single new judge might tip the balance to the conservative side. Meanwhile, Bush assigned moderate nominees to circuits so overwhelmingly liberal or conservative that the views of one new appointee will have little impact. This strategy isn't inappropriate. In presidential elections, voters choose one candidate over another in part because they believe he'll nominate judges who share a vision of the Constitution and the proper judicial role.

By the same token, however, Democratic senators owe a duty to their constituents to refuse confirmation on the same overtly ideological grounds. If our divided government is any measure, the nation is evenly split between the liberal and conservative approaches to constitutional law. It thus is incumbent on Senate Democrats to ensure that the federal courts-the independent third branch of government-reflect the nation's ambivalence. This principle should apply even to the best of Bush's ideological nominees: Michael McConnell, Bush's selection for the U.S. Court of Appeals for the 10th Circuit (which covers Colorado, Kansas, New Mexico, Oklahoma, Utah and Wyoming). McConnell has distinguished himself as a constitutional scholar and has handled important constitutional-law cases. Those who know him, including liberals, say his temperament is suited to the job.

From a Democratic perspective, however, McConnell is profoundly wrong in his approach. First, he is (like Robert Bork) an adherent of the school of constitutional thought that asserts judges should interpret the Constitution according to the "original intent" of the framers. As shown in the Bork hearings, this approach is irremediably flawed. Divining the framers' intent is usually impossible (for one thing, the various framers were rarely of one mind). Moreover, experience with Antonin Scalia, Clarence Thomas and other originalist practitioners shows that their search for original intent is little more than a cloak conservative judges use to dress up their value-laden decisions in the neutral garb of historical inquiry.

Although McConnell may not be on record opposing Roe vs. Wade, his originalist approach makes his opposition a foregone conclusion. In addition, as an avowed fundamentalist Christian, he's arguably the legal world's leading advocate for lowering the wall between church and state. None of these views makes McConnell an extremist. He's more moderate than most conservatives on some issues. At bottom, though, McConnell follows a deeply troubled methodology to reach deeply troubling conclusions. That's grounds enough for rejecting him.

Democratic senators have the right-and even a duty-to force the administration into a compromise on judicial nominations so that the federal courts, now evenly balanced, will continue to reflect the close division in the electorate at large. Such a compromise might involve jointly identifying judicial moderates (a rare breed) or taking turns in choosing judges for the battleground circuit courts. In the meantime, Democrats should honestly and without apology have the courage of their convictions.

Sutton is Not The Saint Portrayed in 'Dispatch'

Andrew J. Imparato, President, American Association of People With Disabilities

Regarding the May 26 Dispatch editorial "Injustice," criticizing the " vexing problem" of disability advocates taking to the streets of Columbus to publicize their opposition to President Bush's nomination of former Ohio solicitor Jeffrey Sutton to the 6th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals, I would encourage the newspaper to consider the facts:

Sutton has been the lead attorney in a series of cases that have limited the ability of individuals to assert their civil rights in federal court.

He has not been simply a lawyer representing a client in one unpopular case, as the editorial suggested. Rather, he aggressively has pursued a prominent national role as the champion of a vocal and powerful minority of far-right legal theorists. Sutton and his allies have had increasing success in revisiting a states'-rights debate that the majority of Americans thought was decided during the Civil War and reinforced during the civil- rights struggles of the 1950s and 1960s.

Disability advocates and our allies have not sought to prevent Sutton from receiving a fair hearing before the Senate Judiciary Committee. Instead, we have sought to educate the senators and their constituents about Sutton's record.

Our ability to assert and enforce our civil rights is not simply "our favorite issue," as The Dispatch asserted.

For us, strong disability-rights enforcement is a matter of life with dignity and equal opportunity.

You will be pleased to know that the revamped White House web site is nearing completion -- thanks to a dozen-member group, including the site's designer, Jane Cook of the Correspondence Office (and former Texas Governor's Office web director).

As a participant in the web team, the Office of Media Affairs has organized an internal review process and a media plan for the rollout.

Before making the site available to the public, the web team would like feedback from the White House staff. The new website is of course subject to change and improvement -- with your input, as well as added content and functionality over time.

We have two requests:

1. Please share the URL of the new site, http://swoa-05.eop.gov, with those in your office who could spend some time this week critiquing the site's:

- Ease of use
- Layout
- Design
- Content
- Grammar/spelling

2. Also, please designate one person in your office to gather your office's feedback and send it to Wendy Nipper in Media Affairs by Friday.

Again, the URL for the new site is: http://swoa-05.eop.gov You will need to re-type or cut and paste the web address into your browser. (Please note this can only be accessed within the White House network.)

Thanks,

Tucker

Just a reminder that the confirmation working group will meet today at 4pm, in the Associate Attorney General's conference room at DOJ (Room 4627). On the agenda, in addition to the current list of high-priority candidates, is tomorrow's subcommittee hearing on "the role of ideology in the judicial selection process."

The SMS client software on your computer will be upgraded tonight from version 1.2 to version 2.0. The SMS client software is what allows new programs to be sent to you via the network. In order for the upgrade to take place, it is necessary that your computer be restarted. To accomplish this, please do the following, when you leave for the day.

1) Close all your programs
2) Click once on start at the lower left corner of your screen
3) Click once on shutdown (the shutdown windows screen should appear)
4) Click once on the circle next to "restart the computer?"
5) Click once on yes
6) You can now leave the computer

Thank You,
John

The SMS client software on your computer will be upgraded tonight from version 1.2 to version 2.0. The SMS client software is what allows new programs to be sent to you via the network. In order for the upgrade to take place, it is necessary that your computer be restarted. To accomplish this, please do the following, when you leave for the day.

1) Close all your programs
2) Click once on start at the lower left corner of your screen
3) Click once on shutdown (the shutdown windows screen should appear)
4) Click once on the circle next to "restart the computer?"
5) Click once on yes
6) You can now leave the computer

Thank You,
John

Mr. Kavanaugh,

I received your request concerning the EOP official asking people outside the government to solicit funds for political parties and political candidates. Ms. Marrone is out of the office until Thursday.
Please advise as to how quickly you need a response.

Sincerely,

Amber Bell

We would like a written opinion (e-mail is fine) on the following question: Can an EOP official who works outside regular work hours ask people outside the government to solicit funds for political parties and political candidates? The EOP official would not himself solicit funds,
but would ask the others to solicit funds.

Schumer: Question Bush Nominees

by JESSE J. HOLLAND
Associated Press Writer

WASHINGTON (AP) -- Senators should grill President
Bush's judicial nominees about abortion and other controversial topics instead of tiptoeing around the issues and then privately basing their decisions on a candidate's ideology, Sen. Charles Schumer says.

Schumer, D-N.Y., chairman of the Senate Judiciary
Committee's courts
panel, is expected at a hearing Tuesday to say
''it's legitimate to use ideology'' when considering judicial nominees, a source close to the senator said.

The role of ideology in judicial selections, the focus of the hearing, has been a running theme throughout the process since
Bush took office.

First, Bush ended the American Bar Association's role in the White
House's confidential judicial screening process.
Many conservatives see the ABA as liberal-leaning and blamed its mixed review of Supreme Court nominee Robert Bork's qualifications for his rejection by the Senate.

Democrats complained that Bush was politicizing the process.

GOP senators now fear Democrats, who took over the Senate this month,
will use their majority status to block Bush's judicial choices for political reasons, including Republicans' treatment of several of former President
Clinton's nominees.

They point to comments like Schumer's ''we will not have nominations of right-wing after right-wing after right-wing
judges'' as evidence.

Democrats, including Schumer, insist they will not use a liberal litmus test
to eliminate Bush nominees.

Skeptical Republicans have delayed reorganization of the Senate as they try to win concessions on judges, including allowing candidates to automatically skip a review by the Senate Judiciary Committee, chaired by Sen. Patrick Leahy, D-Vt., and go straight to the full Senate.

At Tuesday's hearing, top judicial experts will debate ideology's place and whether it should become a permanent part of the process.

Schumer: Question Bush Nominees

by JESSE J. HOLLAND
Associated Press Writer

WASHINGTON (AP) -- Senators should grill President
Bush's judicial nominees about abortion and other controversial
topics instead of tiptoeing around the issues and then privately basing their decisions on a candidate's ideology, Sen. Charles Schumer says.

Schumer, D-N.Y., chairman of the Senate Judiciary
Committee's courts
panel, is expected at a hearing Tuesday to say
''it's legitimate to use ideology'' when considering judicial nominees, a source close to the senator said.

The role of ideology in judicial selections, the focus of the hearing, has been a running theme throughout the process since
Bush took office.

First, Bush ended the American Bar Association's role in the White
House's confidential judicial screening process.
Many conservatives see
the ABA as liberal-leaning and blamed its mixed
review of Supreme Court nominee Robert Bork's qualifications for his rejection by the Senate.

Democrats complained that Bush was politicizing the process.

GOP senators now fear Democrats, who took over the Senate this month,
will use their majority status to block Bush's judicial choices for political reasons, including Republicans' treatment of several of former President
Clinton's nominees.

They point to comments like Schumer's ''we will not have nominations of
judges'' as evidence.

Democrats, including Schumer, insist they will not use a liberal litmus test
to eliminate Bush nominees.

Skeptical Republicans have delayed reorganization of the Senate as they try to win concessions on judges, including allowing candidates to automatically skip a review by the Senate Judiciary Committee, chaired by Sen. Patrick Leahy, D-Vt., and go straight to the full Senate.

At Tuesday's hearing, top judicial experts will debate ideology's place and whether it should become a permanent part of the process.

I just heard Schumer say that it is legitimate for the Senate to ask nominees about their "general views" but not about "specific cases." That statement could be useful to us . . .

STATEMENT OF DONALD R. VEREEN, JR., M.D., M.P.H.
DEPUTY DIRECTOR
OFFICE OF NATIONAL DRUG CONTROL POLICY
BEFORE THE HOUSE COMMITTEE ON GOVERNMENT REFORM
SUBCOMMITTEE ON CRIMINAL JUSTICE, DRUG POLICY, AND HUMAN RESOURCES

"Reauthorization of the Drug-Free Communities Act"

June 28, 2001

Introduction

Chairman Souder, Ranking Member Cummings, distinguished members of the subcommittee, the Office of National Drug Control Policy (ONDCP) welcomes this opportunity to discuss the Drug-Free Communities Program. In 1997, Congress authorized this program and, with the support it provides, America's community coalitions continue to work hard to effectively prevent substance abuse among young people. These coalitions continue working diligently to prevent substance abuse among young people. Communities with diverse economic, social, and cultural demographics across our nation are utilizing their Drug-Free Communities grants to leverage substantial additional resources through cooperation with the private sector and state and local governments. I would like to thank Congressmen Portman and Levin and all of the leaders in the House of Representatives who have set an example with coalitions in their districts and signed on as sponsors of this important legislation.

Background

The Drug-Free Communities Act of 1997 (Section 1023 of the National Narcotics Leadership Act of 1988 (21 U.S.C. 1523)) (DFCA) enjoyed tremendous bipartisan support in both the United States House and Senate. Rob Portman and Sander Levin in the House, and Charles Grassley and Joseph Biden in the Senate led the effort to provide support for coalitions through this effective locally-controlled program. The DFCA authorizes ONDCP to award federal grants to community coalitions. Coalitions work to reduce substance abuse among youth, strengthen collaboration among organizations and agencies in both the private and public sectors, and serve as catalysts for increased citizen participation in our efforts to combat drug abuse. Coalitions use data from all available sources to effectively assess the threat substance abuse poses in their community and develop action plans to address that threat.

Grantees

We are proud that the program currently supports 307 communities located in forty-nine states, Puerto Rico, the U.S. Virgin Islands, and the District of Columbia. Of this number, approximately one-third of the grants have been awarded to small towns or rural areas and twenty-five of the grants have been awarded to communities with predominately Native American and Native Alaskan populations. We anticipate awarding approximately 145 additional grants during the FY 2001 grant cycle (September, 2001).

The maximum award is $100,000 per fiscal year with each grantee required to match federal dollars with non-federal funds or in-kind support. Thus far, this program has leveraged over $56 million in non-federal matching funds. After the initial award, grantees may reapply for additional funding in as many as four subsequent years, though in declining amounts after year two. The program encourages local communities to build sustainable, effective mechanisms to devise and carry out more powerful prevention strategies in future years, relying more heavily on local resources after the initial federal assistance.

Administration of the Program

Through an interagency agreement with ONDCP, the Office of Juvenile Justice and Delinquency Prevention (OJJDP) at the Department of Justice administers the program by processing grant applications, recommending awards, and monitoring the grants. The Center for Substance Abuse Prevention's (CSAP) six regional Centers for the Application of Prevention Technology provide technical assistance and training on topics related to science-based substance abuse prevention practices, evaluation, and coalition development. Because ONDCP does not have the grant management infrastructure necessary to manage all aspects of the program, the Drug Free Communities Administrator coordinates the work of these interagency partners to carry out these functions.

The Advisory Commission

Section 1041 of the DFCA established an eleven member "Advisory Commission on Drug-Free Communities" to: "advise, consult with, and make recommendations to the Director concerning matters related to the activities carried out under the Program." The Commission members have held seven meetings since their appointment in the fall of 1998 (November 1998, April 1999, July 1999, December 1999, March 2000, October 2000, and May 2001). Between meetings, Commission members provide advice and guidance through conference calls, e-mail, and individual telephone consultations with the Administrator and staff. The Advisory Commission has played an important role in the program's success.

Collaboration to support Drug Free Communities

The Community Anti-Drug Coalitions of America (CADCA) serves as one of our most valuable private sector partners. Their annual National Leadership Forum is the premier gathering of coalition leaders from hundreds of communities. The National Guard Bureau's Counter-Drug Office provides invaluable assistance to numerous coalitions on special projects and also devotes resources for drug prevention programming.

Reauthorization of the Drug-Free Communities Act of 1997

The President's budget requests $50.6 million to expand the Drug-Free Communities Program in FY 2002, an increase of $10.7 million over the FY 2001 enacted level. It also calls for the reauthorization of the Act.

On June 21, Congressman Portman and Levin introduced H.R. 2291 along with 18 cosponsors. I am pleased to support this reauthorization proposal and offer comments on behalf of ONDCP.

Of the total $50.6 million, $46.6 million will go directly to community anti-drug coalitions. We anticipate being able to award approximately 130 new grants in FY 2002, bringing the cumulative five-year total number of grants to approximately 600. HR 2291 would continue to ensure that communities' leverage these grant dollars by matching grant funds with non-Federal support, including both monetary and in-kind contributions.

Additionally, H.R. 2291 provides for additional support to community coalitions through improved training, technical assistance, and dissemination of best practices. It authorizes the creation of a National Community Coalition Institute that will provide education, training, and technical assistance for coalitions that is vital for the program's continued growth and success as the number of grantees increases. The Institute will also develop and disseminate evaluation and testing mechanisms to assist coalitions in measuring and assessing their performance.

H.R. 2291 would also provide for supplemental grants to experienced coalitions to mentor new coalitions and provide the benefit of their experience. Coalitions that meet stringent criteria for candidacy are eligible to apply and, if accepted, provide substantial support to the coalition they mentor.

Of the total $50.6 million authorized in H.R. 2291 and requested in the President's budget, only $4 million would be allocated for purposes other than providing grants directly to communities. These funds would be allocated to the following activities:

- Grants Administration that will provide support for OJJDP to ensure continuity in its grants management function through an Interagency Agreement with ONDCP.

- Training and Technical Assistance that will provide support for high-quality, low-cost training and technical assistance via each of the six regional Centers for the Application of Prevention Technology (CAPTs), managed by the Center for Substance Abuse Prevention (CSAP). This is an especially important function, considering the tremendous response ONDCP has received from coalitions in rural or other traditionally under-served areas, which do not have experience in applying for Federal grant funds. ONDCP will continue to utilize the resources of The Community Anti-Drug Coalitions of America (CADCA) to provide a wide array of technical assistance and program support to community coalitions.

- Evaluation, which has been supported Congress, DFC Advisory Commission, and ONDCP. An empirically sound evaluation is of paramount importance to maintain the integrity of this program.

- Program Administration that will provide support for the Program Administrator and the statutory Advisory Commission. The Program Administrator serves a critical function by ensuring a high level of responsiveness to the grantees and applicants, as well as enhancing interagency collaboration.

This level of administrative support, while a departure from the original plan of the Drug-Free Communities Act of 1997, reflects the experience of ONDCP, OJJDP and the Appropriations Subcommittees that provide funds for the program. While the initial authorization provided for a decreasing percentage for administrative costs each year, the requirements of grant-making law and the increasing number of grants awarded each year have required a higher resource commitment.

ONDCP conducted a comprehensive study of the administrative costs associated with the Drug-Free Communities Program and produced a report pursuant to Senate Appropriations Committee Report 106-500 (accompanying S. 2900), which was submitted for the subcommittee's consideration on January 18, 2001. The report concluded that amending the administrative cost limitation to "not more than eight percent" per fiscal year would allow compliance with grant-making laws. It would provide thorough competitive peer review of all applications, enhance grantee access to valuable technical assistance about science-based prevention practices and training in those practices, improve ONDCP's and OJJDP's ability to manage the grant program through a comprehensive evaluation, and allow for greater promotion of the program to coalitions across the United States. Such an increase ensures that the grants awarded directly to community anti-drug coalitions will be used in the most effective manner possible.

Conclusion

We thank the committee for this opportunity to offer our support for this important legislation on behalf of the President. As you know, he has committed his administration to an all-out effort to reduce drug abuse. Community coalitions will be in the vanguard of this effort.

107TH CONGRESS
1ST SESSION

H. R. 2291

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Mr. PORTMAN introduced the following bill; which was referred to the Committee on _____

A BILL

To extend the authorization of the Drug-Free Communities Support Program for an additional 5 years, to authorize a National Community Antidrug Coalition Institute, and for other purposes.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

REV_00128111

SECTION 1. FIVE-YEAR EXTENSION OF DRUG-FREE COMMUNITIES SUPPORT PROGRAM.

(a) FINDINGS.—Congress makes the following findings:

(1) In the next 15 years, the youth population in the United States will grow by 21 percent, adding 6,500,000 youth to the population of the United States. Even if drug use rates remain constant, there will be a huge surge in drug-related problems, such as academic failure, drug-related violence, and HIV incidence, simply due to this population increase.

(2) According to the 1994–1996 National Household Survey, 60 percent of students age 12 to 17 who frequently cut classes and who reported delinquent behavior in the past 6 months used marijuana 52 days or more in the previous year.

(3) The 2000 Washington Kids Count survey conducted by the University of Washington reported that students whose peers have little or no involvement with drinking and drugs have higher math and reading scores than students whose peers had low level drinking or drug use.

(4) Substance abuse prevention works. In 1999, only 10 percent of teens saw marijuana users as popular, compared to 17 percent in 1998 and 19 percent in 1997. The rate of past-month use of any drug among 12 to 17 year olds declined 26 percent between 1997 and 1999. Marijuana use for sixth through eighth graders is at the lowest point in 5 years, as is use of cocaine, inhalants, and hallucinogens.

(5) Community Anti-Drug Coalitions throughout the United States are successfully developing and implementing comprehensive, long-term strategies to reduce substance abuse among youth on a sustained basis. For example:

(A) The Boston Coalition brought college and university presidents together to create the Cooperative Agreement on Underage Drinking. This agreement represents the first coordinated effort of Boston's many institutions of higher education to address issues such as binge drinking, underage drinking, and changing the norms surrounding alcohol abuse that exist on college and university campuses.

(B) In 2000, the Coalition for a Drug-Free Greater Cincinnati surveyed more than 47,000 local students in grades 7 through 12. The results provided evidence that the Coalition's initiatives are working. For the first time in a decade, teen drug use in Greater Cincinnati appears to be leveling off. The data collected from the survey has served as a tool to strengthen relationships between schools and communities, as well as facilitate the growth of anti-drug coalitions in communities where such coalitions had not existed.

(C) The Miami Coalition used a three-part strategy to decrease the percentage of high school seniors who reported using marijuana at least once during the most recent 30-day period. The development of a media strategy, the creation of a network of prevention agencies, and discussions with high school students about the dangers of marijuana all contributed to a decrease in the percentage of seniors who reported using marijuana from over 22 percent in 1995 to 9 percent in 1997. The Miami Coalition was able to achieve these results while national rates of marijuana use were increasing.

(D) The Nashville Prevention Partnership worked with elementary and middle school children in an attempt to influence them toward positive life goals and discourage them from using substances. The Partnership targeted an area in East Nashville and created after school programs, mentoring opportunities, attendance initiatives, and safe passages to and from school. Attendance and test scores increased as a result of the program.

(E) At a youth-led town meeting sponsored by the Bering Strait Community Partnership in Nome, Alaska, youth identified a need for a safe, substance-free space. With help from a variety of community partners, the Partnership staff and youth members created the Java Hut, a substance-free coffeehouse designed for youth. The Java Hut is helping to change norms in the community by providing a fun, youth-friendly atmosphere and activities that are not centered around alcohol or marijuana.

(F) Portland's Regional Drug Initiative (RDI) has promoted the establishment of drug-free workplaces among the city's large and small employers. Over 3,000 employers have attended an RDI training session, and of those, 92 percent have instituted drug-free workplace policies. As a result, there has been a 5.5 percent decrease in positive workplace drug tests.

(G) San Antonio Fighting Back worked to increase the age at which youth first used illegal substances. Research suggests that the later the age of first use, the lower the risk that a young person will become a regular substance abuser. As a result, the age of first illegal drug use increased from 9.4 years in 1992 to 13.5 years in 1997.

(H) In 1990, multiple data sources confirmed a trend of increased alcohol use by teenagers in the Troy community. Using its "multiple strategies over multiple sectors" approach, the Troy Coalition worked with parents, physicians, students, coaches, and others to address this problem from several angles. As a result, the rate of twelfth grade students who had consumed alcohol in the past month decreased from 62.1 percent to 53.3 percent between 1991 and 1998, and the rate of eighth grade students decreased from 26.3 percent to 17.4 percent. The Troy Coalition believes that this decline represents not only a change in behavior on the part of students, but also a change in the norms of the community.

(6) Despite these successes, drug use continues to be a serious problem facing communities across the United States. For example:

(A) According to the Pulse Check: Trends in Drug Abuse Mid-Year 2000 report—

(i) crack and powder cocaine remains the most serious drug problem;

(ii) marijuana remains the most widely available illicit drug, and its potency is on the rise;

(iii) treatment sources report an increase in admissions with marijuana as the primary drug of abuse—and adolescents outnumber other age groups entering treatment for marijuana;

(iv) 80 percent of Pulse Check sources reported increased availability of club drugs, with ecstasy (MDMA) and ketamine the most widely cited club drugs and seven sources reporting that powder cocaine is being used as a club drug by young adults;

(v) ecstasy abuse and trafficking is expanding, no longer confined to the "rave" scene;

(vi) the sale and use of club drugs has grown from nightclubs and raves to high schools, the streets, neighborhoods, open venues, and younger ages;

(vii) ecstasy users often are unknowingly purchasing adulterated tablets or some other substance sold as MDMA; and

(viii) along with reports of increased heroin snorting as a route of administration for initiates, there is also an increase in injecting initiates and the negative health consequences associated with injection (for example, increases in HIV/AIDS and Hepatitis C) suggesting that there is a generational forgetting of the dangers of injection of the drug.

(B) The 2000 Parent's Resource Institute for Drug Education study reported that 23.6 percent of children in the sixth through twelfth grades used illicit drugs in the past year. The same study found that monthly usage among this group was 15.3 percent.

(C) According to the 2000 Monitoring the Future study, the use of ecstasy among eighth graders increased from 1.7 percent in 1999 to

3.1 percent in 2000, among tenth graders from 4.4 percent to 5.4 percent, and from 5.6 percent to 8.2 percent among twelfth graders.

(D) A 1999 Mellman Group study found that—

(i) 56 percent of the population in the United States believed that drug use was increasing in 1999;

(ii) 92 percent of the population viewed illegal drug use as a serious problem in the United States; and

(iii) 73 percent of the population viewed illegal drug use as a serious problem in their communities.

(7) According to the 2001 report of the National Center on Addiction and Substance Abuse at Columbia University entitled "Shoveling Up: The Impact of Substance Abuse on State Budgets", using the most conservative assumption, in 1998 States spent $77,900,000,000 to shovel up the wreckage of substance abuse, only $3,000,000,000 to prevent and treat the problem and $433,000,000 for alcohol and tobacco regulation and compliance. This $77,900,000,000 burden was distributed as follows:

(A) $30,700,000,000 in the justice system (77 percent of justice spending).

(B) $16,500,000,000 in education costs (10 percent of education spending).

(C) $15,200,000,000 in health costs (25 percent of health spending).

(D) $7,700,000,000 in child and family assistance (32 percent of child and family assistance spending).

(E) $5,900,000,000 in mental health and developmental disabilities (31 percent of mental health spending).

(F) $1,500,000,000 in public safety (26 percent of public safety spending) and $400,000,000 for the state workforce.

(8) Intergovernmental cooperation and coordination through national, State, and local or tribal leadership and partnerships are critical to facilitate the reduction of substance abuse among youth in communities across the United States.

(9) Substance abuse is perceived as a much greater problem nationally than at the community level. According to a 2001 study sponsored by The Pew Charitable Trusts, between 1994 and 2000—

(A) there was a 43 percent increase in the percentage of Americans who felt progress was being made in the war on drugs at the community level;

(B) only 9 percent of Americans say drug abuse is a "crisis" in their neighborhood, compared to 27 percent who say this about the nation; and

(C) the percentage of those who felt we lost ground in the war on drugs on a community level fell by more than a quarter, from 51 percent in 1994 to 37 percent in 2000.

(b) EXTENSION AND INCREASE OF PROGRAM.—Section 1024(a) of the National Narcotics Leadership Act of 1988 (21 U.S.C. 1524(a)) is amended—

(1) by striking "and" at the end of paragraph (4); and

(2) by striking paragraph (5) and inserting the following new paragraphs:

"(5) $50,600,000 for fiscal year 2002;

"(6) $60,000,000 for fiscal year 2003;

"(7) $70,000,000 for fiscal year 2004;

"(8) $70,000,000 for fiscal year 2005;

"(9) $75,000,000 for fiscal year 2006; and

"(10) $75,000,000 for fiscal year 2007.".

(c) EXTENSION OF LIMITATION ON ADMINISTRATIVE COSTS.—Section 1024(b) of that Act (21 U.S.C. 1524(b)) is amended by striking paragraph (5) and inserting the following new paragraph (5):

"(5) 8 percent for each of fiscal years 2002 through 2007.".

(d) ADDITIONAL GRANTS.—Section 1032(b) of that Act (21 U.S.C. 1533(b)) is amended by adding at the end the following new paragraph (3):

"(C) NO PRIORITY FOR APPLICATIONS.—The Administrator may not afford a higher priority in the award of an additional grant under this paragraph than the Administrator would afford the applicant for the grant if the applicant were submitting an application for an initial grant under paragraph (1) or (2) rather than an application for a grant under this paragraph.

"(D) RENEWAL GRANTS.—Subject to subparagraph (F), the Administrator may award a renewal grant to a grant recipient under this paragraph for each of the fiscal years of the 4-fiscal year period following the fiscal year for which the initial additional grant under subparagraph (A) is awarded in an amount not to exceed amounts as follows:

"(i) For the first and second fiscal years of that 4-fiscal year period, the amount equal to 80 percent of the non-Federal funds, including in-kind contributions, raised by the coalition for the applicable fiscal year.

"(ii) For the second, third, and fourth fiscal years of that 4-fiscal year period, the amount equal to 67 percent of the non-Federal funds, including in-kind contributions, raised by the coalition for the applicable fiscal year.

"(E) SUSPENSION.—If a grant recipient under this paragraph fails to continue to meet the criteria specified in subsection (a), the Administrator may suspend the grant, after providing written notice to the grant recipient and an opportunity to appeal.

"(F) LIMITATION.—The amount of a grant award under this paragraph may not exceed $100,000 for a fiscal year.".

(e) DATA COLLECTION AND DISSEMINATION.—Section 1033(b) of that Act (21 U.S.C. 1533(b)) is amended by adding at the end the following new paragraph:

"(3) CONSULTATION.—The Administrator shall carry out activities under this subsection in consultation with the Advisory Commission and the National Community Antidrug Coalition Institute.".

(f) LIMITATION ON USE OF CERTAIN FUNDS FOR EVALUATION OF PROGRAM.—Section 1033(b) of that Act, as amended by subsection (e) of this section, is further is amended by adding at the end the following new paragraph:

REV_00128124

"(4) LIMITATION ON USE OF CERTAIN FUNDS FOR EVALUATION OF PROGRAM.—Amounts for activities under paragraph (2)(B) may not be derived from amounts under section 1024(a) except for amounts that are available under section 1024(b) for administrative costs.".

STATEMENT OF DONALD R. VEREEN, JR., M.D., M.P.H.
DEPUTY DIRECTOR
OFFICE OF NATIONAL DRUG CONTROL POLICY
BEFORE THE HOUSE COMMITTEE ON GOVERNMENT REFORM
SUBCOMMITTEE ON CRIMINAL JUSTICE, DRUG POLICY, AND HUMAN RESOURCES

"Reauthorization of the Drug-Free Communities Act"

June 28, 2001

Introduction

Chairman Souder, Ranking Member Cummings, distinguished members of the subcommittee, the Office of National Drug Control Policy (ONDCP) welcomes this opportunity to discuss the Drug-Free Communities Program. In 1997, Congress authorized this program and, with the support it provides, America's community coalitions continue to work hard to effectively prevent substance abuse among young people. These coalitions continue working diligently to prevent substance abuse among young people. Communities with diverse economic, social, and cultural demographics across our nation are utilizing their Drug-Free Communities grants to leverage substantial additional resources through cooperation with the private sector and state and local governments. I would like to thank Congressmen Portman and Levin and all of the leaders in the House of Representatives who have set an example with coalitions in their districts and signed on as sponsors of this important legislation.

Background

The Drug-Free Communities Act of 1997 (Section 1023 of the National Narcotics Leadership Act of 1988 (21 U.S.C. 1523)) (DFCA) enjoyed tremendous bipartisan support in both the United States House and Senate. Rob Portman and Sander Levin in the House, and Charles Grassley and Joseph Biden in the Senate led the effort to provide support for coalitions through this effective locally-controlled program. The DFCA authorizes ONDCP to award federal grants to community coalitions. Coalitions work to reduce substance abuse among youth, strengthen collaboration among organizations and agencies in both the private and public sectors, and serve as catalysts for increased citizen participation in our efforts to combat drug abuse. Coalitions use data from all available sources to effectively assess the threat substance abuse poses in their community and develop action plans to address that threat.

Grantees

We are proud that the program currently supports 307 communities located in forty-nine states, Puerto Rico, the U.S. Virgin Islands, and the District of Columbia. Of this number, approximately one-third of the grants have been awarded to small towns or rural areas and twenty-five of the grants have been awarded to communities with predominately Native American and Native Alaskan populations. We anticipate awarding approximately 145 additional grants during the FY 2001 grant cycle (September, 2001).

The maximum award is $100,000 per fiscal year with each grantee required to match federal dollars with non-federal funds or in-kind support. Thus far, this program has leveraged over $56 million in non-federal matching funds. After the initial award, grantees may reapply for additional funding in as many as four subsequent years, though in declining amounts after year two. The program encourages local communities to build sustainable, effective mechanisms to devise and carry out more powerful prevention strategies in future years, relying more heavily on local resources after the initial federal assistance.

Administration of the Program

Through an interagency agreement with ONDCP, the Office of Juvenile Justice and Delinquency Prevention (OJJDP) at the Department of Justice administers the program by processing grant applications, recommending awards, and monitoring the grants. The Center for Substance Abuse Prevention's (CSAP) six regional Centers for the Application of Prevention Technology provide technical assistance and training on topics related to science-based substance abuse prevention practices, evaluation, and coalition development. Because ONDCP does not have the grant management infrastructure necessary to manage all aspects of the program, the Drug Free Communities Administrator coordinates the work of these interagency partners to carry out these functions.

The Advisory Commission

Section 1041 of the DFCA established an eleven member "Advisory Commission on Drug-Free Communities" to: "advise, consult with, and make recommendations to the Director concerning matters related to the activities carried out under the Program." The Commission members have held seven meetings since their appointment in the fall of 1998 (November 1998, April 1999, July 1999, December 1999, March 2000, October 2000, and May 2001). Between meetings, Commission members provide advice and guidance through conference calls, e-mail, and individual telephone consultations with the Administrator and staff. The Advisory Commission has played an important role in the program's success.

Collaboration to support Drug Free Communities

The Community Anti-Drug Coalitions of America (CADCA) serves as one of our most valuable private sector partners. Their annual National Leadership Forum is the premier gathering of coalition leaders from hundreds of communities. The National Guard Bureau's Counter-Drug Office provides invaluable assistance to numerous coalitions on special projects and also devotes resources for drug prevention programming.

Reauthorization of the Drug-Free Communities Act of 1997

The President's budget requests $50.6 million to expand the Drug-Free Communities Program in FY 2002, an increase of $10.7 million over the FY 2001 enacted level. It also calls for the reauthorization of the Act.

On June 21, Congressman Portman and Levin introduced H.R. 2291 along with 18 cosponsors. I am pleased to support this reauthorization proposal and offer comments on behalf of ONDCP.

Of the total $50.6 million, $46.6 million will go directly to community anti-drug coalitions. We anticipate being able to award approximately 130 new grants in FY 2002, bringing the cumulative five-year total number of grants to approximately 600. HR 2291 would continue to ensure that communities' leverage these grant dollars by matching grant funds with non-Federal support, including both monetary and in-kind contributions.

Additionally, H.R. 2291 provides for additional support to community coalitions through improved training, technical assistance, and dissemination of best practices. It authorizes the creation of a National Community Coalition Institute that will provide education, training, and technical assistance for coalitions that is vital for the program's continued growth and success as the number of grantees increases. The Institute will also develop and disseminate evaluation and testing mechanisms to assist coalitions in measuring and assessing their performance.

H.R. 2291 would also provide for supplemental grants to experienced coalitions to mentor new coalitions and provide the benefit of their experience. Coalitions that meet stringent criteria for candidacy are eligible to apply and, if accepted, provide substantial support to the coalition they mentor.

Of the total $50.6 million authorized in H.R. 2291 and requested in the President's budget, only $4 million would be allocated for purposes other than providing grants directly to communities. These funds would be allocated to the following activities:

- Grants Administration that will provide support for OJJDP to ensure continuity in its grants management function through an Interagency Agreement with ONDCP.

- Training and Technical Assistance that will provide support for high-quality, low-cost training and technical assistance via each of the six regional Centers for the Application of Prevention Technology (CAPTs), managed by the Center for Substance Abuse Prevention (CSAP). This is an especially important function, considering the tremendous response ONDCP has received from coalitions in rural or other traditionally under-served areas, which do not have experience in applying for Federal grant funds. ONDCP will continue to utilize the resources of The Community Anti-Drug Coalitions of America (CADCA) to provide a wide array of technical assistance and program support to community coalitions.

- Evaluation, which has been supported Congress, DFC Advisory Commission, and ONDCP. An empirically sound evaluation is of paramount importance to maintain the integrity of this program.

- Program Administration that will provide support for the Program Administrator and the statutory Advisory Commission. The Program Administrator serves a critical function by ensuring a high level of responsiveness to the grantees and applicants, as well as enhancing interagency collaboration.

This level of administrative support, while a departure from the original plan of the Drug-Free Communities Act of 1997, reflects the experience of ONDCP, OJJDP and the Appropriations Subcommittees that provide funds for the program. While the initial authorization provided for a decreasing percentage for administrative costs each year, the requirements of grant-making law and the increasing number of grants awarded each year have required a higher resource commitment.

ONDCP conducted a comprehensive study of the administrative costs associated with the Drug-Free Communities Program and produced a report pursuant to Senate Appropriations Committee Report 106-500 (accompanying S. 2900), which was submitted for the subcommittee's consideration on January 18, 2001. The report concluded that amending the administrative cost limitation to "not more than eight percent" per fiscal year would allow compliance with grant-making laws. It would provide thorough competitive peer review of all applications, enhance grantee access to valuable technical assistance about science-based prevention practices and training in those practices, improve ONDCP's and OJJDP's ability to manage the grant program through a comprehensive evaluation, and allow for greater promotion of the program to coalitions across the United States. Such an increase ensures that the grants awarded directly to community anti-drug coalitions will be used in the most effective manner possible.

Conclusion

We thank the committee for this opportunity to offer our support for this important legislation on behalf of the President. As you know, he has committed his administration to an all-out effort to reduce drug abuse. Community coalitions will be in the vanguard of this effort.

107TH CONGRESS
1ST SESSION

H. R. 2291

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Mr. PORTMAN introduced the following bill; which was referred to the Committee on _____

A BILL

To extend the authorization of the Drug-Free Communities Support Program for an additional 5 years, to authorize a National Community Antidrug Coalition Institute, and for other purposes.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

REV_00128153

SECTION 1. FIVE-YEAR EXTENSION OF DRUG-FREE COMMUNITIES SUPPORT PROGRAM.

(a) FINDINGS.—Congress makes the following findings:

(1) In the next 15 years, the youth population in the United States will grow by 21 percent, adding 6,500,000 youth to the population of the United States. Even if drug use rates remain constant, there will be a huge surge in drug-related problems, such as academic failure, drug-related violence, and HIV incidence, simply due to this population increase.

(2) According to the 1994–1996 National Household Survey, 60 percent of students age 12 to 17 who frequently cut classes and who reported delinquent behavior in the past 6 months used marijuana 52 days or more in the previous year.

(3) The 2000 Washington Kids Count survey conducted by the University of Washington reported that students whose peers have little or no involvement with drinking and drugs have higher math and reading scores than students whose peers had low level drinking or drug use.

(4) Substance abuse prevention works. In 1999, only 10 percent of teens saw marijuana users as popular, compared to 17 percent in 1998 and 19 percent in 1997. The rate of past-month use of any drug among 12 to 17 year olds declined 26 percent between 1997 and 1999. Marijuana use for sixth through eighth graders is at the lowest point in 5 years, as is use of cocaine, inhalants, and hallucinogens.

(5) Community Anti-Drug Coalitions throughout the United States are successfully developing and implementing comprehensive, long-term strategies to reduce substance abuse among youth on a sustained basis. For example:

(A) The Boston Coalition brought college and university presidents together to create the Cooperative Agreement on Underage Drinking. This agreement represents the first coordinated effort of Boston's many institutions of higher education to address issues such as binge drinking, underage drinking, and changing the norms surrounding alcohol abuse that exist on college and university campuses.

(B) In 2000, the Coalition for a Drug-Free Greater Cincinnati surveyed more than 47,000 local students in grades 7 through 12. The results provided evidence that the Coalition's initiatives are working. For the first time in a decade, teen drug use in Greater Cincinnati appears to be leveling off. The data collected from the survey has served as a tool to strengthen relationships between schools and communities, as well as facilitate the growth of anti-drug coalitions in communities where such coalitions had not existed.

(C) The Miami Coalition used a three-part strategy to decrease the percentage of high school seniors who reported using marijuana at least once during the most recent 30-day period. The development of a media strategy, the creation of a network of prevention agencies, and discussions with high school students about the dangers of marijuana all contributed to a decrease in the percentage of seniors who reported using marijuana from over 22 percent in 1995 to 9 percent in 1997. The Miami Coalition was able to achieve these results while national rates of marijuana use were increasing.

(D) The Nashville Prevention Partnership worked with elementary and middle school children in an attempt to influence them toward positive life goals and discourage them from using substances. The Partnership targeted an area in East Nashville and created after school programs, mentoring opportunities, attendance initiatives, and safe passages to and from school. Attendance and test scores increased as a result of the program.

(E) At a youth-led town meeting sponsored by the Bering Strait Community Partnership in Nome, Alaska, youth identified a need for a safe, substance-free space. With help from a variety of community partners, the Partnership staff and youth members created the Java Hut, a substance-free coffeehouse designed for youth. The Java Hut is helping to change norms in the community by providing a fun, youth-friendly atmosphere and activities that are not centered around alcohol or marijuana.

(F) Portland's Regional Drug Initiative (RDI) has promoted the establishment of drug-free workplaces among the city's large and small employers. Over 3,000 employers have attended an RDI training session, and of those, 92 percent have instituted drug-free workplace policies. As a result, there has been a 5.5 percent decrease in positive workplace drug tests.

(G) San Antonio Fighting Back worked to increase the age at which youth first used illegal substances. Research suggests that the later the age of first use, the lower the risk that a young person will become a regular substance abuser. As a result, the age of first illegal drug use increased from 9.4 years in 1992 to 13.5 years in 1997.

(H) In 1990, multiple data sources confirmed a trend of increased alcohol use by teenagers in the Troy community. Using its "multiple strategies over multiple sectors" approach, the Troy Coalition worked with parents, physicians, students, coaches, and others to address this problem from several angles. As a result, the rate of twelfth grade students who had consumed alcohol in the past month decreased from 62.1 percent to 53.3 percent between 1991 and 1998, and the rate of eighth grade students decreased from 26.3 percent to 17.4 percent. The Troy Coalition believes that this decline represents not only a change in behavior on the part of students, but also a change in the norms of the community.

(6) Despite these successes, drug use continues to be a serious problem facing communities across the United States. For example:

(A) According to the Pulse Check: Trends in Drug Abuse Mid-Year 2000 report—

(i) crack and powder cocaine remains the most serious drug problem;

(ii) marijuana remains the most widely available illicit drug, and its potency is on the rise;

(iii) treatment sources report an increase in admissions with marijuana as the primary drug of abuse—and adolescents outnumber other age groups entering treatment for marijuana;

(iv) 80 percent of Pulse Check sources reported increased availability of club drugs, with ecstasy (MDMA) and ketamine the most widely cited club drugs and seven sources reporting that powder cocaine is being used as a club drug by young adults;

(v) ecstasy abuse and trafficking is expanding, no longer confined to the "rave" scene;

(vi) the sale and use of club drugs has grown from nightclubs and raves to high schools, the streets, neighborhoods, open venues, and younger ages;

(vii) ecstasy users often are unknowingly purchasing adulterated tablets or some other substance sold as MDMA; and

(viii) along with reports of increased heroin snorting as a route of administration for initiates, there is also an increase in injecting initiates and the negative health consequences associated with injection (for example, increases in HIV/AIDS and Hepatitis C) suggesting that there is a generational forgetting of the dangers of injection of the drug.

(B) The 2000 Parent's Resource Institute for Drug Education study reported that 23.6 percent of children in the sixth through twelfth grades used illicit drugs in the past year. The same study found that monthly usage among this group was 15.3 percent.

(C) According to the 2000 Monitoring the Future study, the use of ecstasy among eighth graders increased from 1.7 percent in 1999 to

3.1 percent in 2000, among tenth graders from 4.4 percent to 5.4 percent, and from 5.6 percent to 8.2 percent among twelfth graders.

(D) A 1999 Mellman Group study found that—

(i) 56 percent of the population in the United States believed that drug use was increasing in 1999;

(ii) 92 percent of the population viewed illegal drug use as a serious problem in the United States; and

(iii) 73 percent of the population viewed illegal drug use as a serious problem in their communities.

(7) According to the 2001 report of the National Center on Addiction and Substance Abuse at Columbia University entitled "Shoveling Up: The Impact of Substance Abuse on State Budgets", using the most conservative assumption, in 1998 States spent $77,900,000,000 to shovel up the wreckage of substance abuse, only $3,000,000,000 to prevent and treat the problem and $433,000,000 for alcohol and tobacco regulation and compliance. This $77,900,000,000 burden was distributed as follows:

(A) $30,700,000,000 in the justice system (77 percent of justice spending).

(B) $16,500,000,000 in education costs (10 percent of education spending).

(C) $15,200,000,000 in health costs (25 percent of health spending).

(D) $7,700,000,000 in child and family assistance (32 percent of child and family assistance spending).

(E) $5,900,000,000 in mental health and developmental disabilities (31 percent of mental health spending).

(F) $1,500,000,000 in public safety (26 percent of public safety spending) and $400,000,000 for the state workforce.

(8) Intergovernmental cooperation and coordination through national, State, and local or tribal leadership and partnerships are critical to facilitate the reduction of substance abuse among youth in communities across the United States.

(9) Substance abuse is perceived as a much greater problem nationally than at the community level. According to a 2001 study sponsored by The Pew Charitable Trusts, between 1994 and 2000—

(A) there was a 43 percent increase in the percentage of Americans who felt progress was being made in the war on drugs at the community level;

(B) only 9 percent of Americans say drug abuse is a "crisis" in their neighborhood, compared to 27 percent who say this about the nation; and

(C) the percentage of those who felt we lost ground in the war on drugs on a community level fell by more than a quarter, from 51 percent in 1994 to 37 percent in 2000.

(b) EXTENSION AND INCREASE OF PROGRAM.—Section 1024(a) of the National Narcotics Leadership Act of 1988 (21 U.S.C. 1524(a)) is amended—

(1) by striking "and" at the end of paragraph (4); and

(2) by striking paragraph (5) and inserting the following new paragraphs:

"(5) $50,600,000 for fiscal year 2002;

"(6) $60,000,000 for fiscal year 2003;

"(7) $70,000,000 for fiscal year 2004;

"(8) $70,000,000 for fiscal year 2005;

"(9) $75,000,000 for fiscal year 2006; and

"(10) $75,000,000 for fiscal year 2007.".

(c) EXTENSION OF LIMITATION ON ADMINISTRATIVE COSTS.—Section 1024(b) of that Act (21 U.S.C. 1524(b)) is amended by striking paragraph (5) and inserting the following new paragraph (5):

"(5) 8 percent for each of fiscal years 2002 through 2007.".

(d) ADDITIONAL GRANTS.—Section 1032(b) of that Act (21 U.S.C. 1533(b)) is amended by adding at the end the following new paragraph (3):

"(3) ADDITIONAL GRANTS.—

"(A) IN GENERAL.—Subject to subparagraph (F), the Administrator may award an additional grant under this paragraph to an eligible coalition awarded a grant under paragraph (1) or (2) for any first fiscal year after the end of the 4-year period following the period of the initial grant under paragraph (1) or (2), as the case may be.

"(B) SCOPE OF GRANTS.—A coalition awarded a grant under paragraph (1) or (2), including a renewal grant under such paragraph, may not be awarded another grant under such paragraph, and is eligible for an additional grant under this section only under this paragraph.

"(C) NO PRIORITY FOR APPLICATIONS.—The Administrator may not afford a higher priority in the award of an additional grant under this paragraph than the Administrator would afford the applicant for the grant if the applicant were submitting an application for an initial grant under paragraph (1) or (2) rather than an application for a grant under this paragraph.

"(D) RENEWAL GRANTS.—Subject to subparagraph (F), the Administrator may award a renewal grant to a grant recipient under this paragraph for each of the fiscal years of the 4-fiscal year period following the fiscal year for which the initial additional grant under subparagraph (A) is awarded in an amount not to exceed amounts as follows:

"(i) For the first and second fiscal years of that 4-fiscal year period, the amount equal to 80 percent of the non-Federal funds, including in-kind contributions, raised by the coalition for the applicable fiscal year.

"(ii) For the second, third, and fourth fiscal years of that 4-fiscal year period, the amount equal to 67 percent of the non-Federal funds, including in-kind contributions, raised by the coalition for the applicable fiscal year.

"(E) SUSPENSION.—If a grant recipient under this paragraph fails to continue to meet the criteria specified in subsection (a), the Administrator may suspend the grant, after providing written notice to the grant recipient and an opportunity to appeal.

"(F) LIMITATION.—The amount of a grant award under this paragraph may not exceed $100,000 for a fiscal year.".

(e) DATA COLLECTION AND DISSEMINATION.—Section 1033(b) of that Act (21 U.S.C. 1533(b)) is amended by adding at the end the following new paragraph:

"(3) CONSULTATION.—The Administrator shall carry out activities under this subsection in consultation with the Advisory Commission and the National Community Antidrug Coalition Institute.".

(f) LIMITATION ON USE OF CERTAIN FUNDS FOR EVALUATION OF PROGRAM.—Section 1033(b) of that Act, as amended by subsection (e) of this section, is further is amended by adding at the end the following new paragraph:

REV_00128166

"(4) LIMITATION ON USE OF CERTAIN FUNDS FOR EVALUATION OF PROGRAM.—Amounts for activities under paragraph (2)(B) may not be derived from amounts under section 1024(a) except for amounts that are available under section 1024(b) for administrative costs.".

POTUS STATEMENTS RE: SUPREME COURT RETIREMENTS

I. CLINTON STATEMENT/Q&A RE: BLACKMUN RETIREMENT

President BILL CLINTON: It's my honor, on behalf of the people of the United States of America, to thank Justice Blackmun for his lifetime of service to our nation. I have received his letter announcing his intention to step down from the Supreme Court. In so doing, he will step up into our history. During his 24 years on our highest court, Justice Blackmun has become part of the rich and evolving story of American justice and constitutional law. With majesty and reason, with scholarship and grace, he is a good man who has earned the respect and the gratitude of every one of his fellow countrymen and women.

When President Nixon nominated Harry Blackmun for service on the court, his candidacy naturally occasioned a great deal of speculation about what kind of justice he would be. Some labeled him a strict constructionist. But he rejected any attempt to tag him with a label, saying, and I quote, "I've been called liberal and conservative. Labels are deceiving. I call them as I see them." Twenty-four years later we can say that he did exactly what he said he would do 24 years ago.

It was President Woodrow Wilson who called our judiciary the balance wheel of our entire system. It is meant to maintain a nice adjustment between individual rights and government powers which constitutes political liberty. Harry Blackmun has been a steady and strong hand on that balance wheel. In cases argued before him he found the human dimension and struck the right balance. In the struggle over how we might best overcome our legacy of racism; in protecting the women's reproductive rights and providing poor people and sick people access to the lowest-priced prescription drugs; in opening the courthouse doors to the mentally ill and upholding tough sentencing guidelines that keep hardened criminals confined in prison; in averting a constitutional crisis by voting with a united court to tell the president who appointed him to obey the law.

Those of us who have studied the law can at times be lost in its abstractions. The habits, the procedures, the language of the law can separate lawyers from the people who look to the bar for justice. Justice Blackmun's identification was firmly and decisively with the ordinary people of this country, with their concerns, and his humanity was often given voice not only in majority opinions, but in his dissents. When he stood apart from the court and aligned himself with an abused son against a violent parent and an indifferent child welfare agency, he appealed to the court, 'What is required of us is moral ambition. Poor Joshua. It is a sad commentary upon American life and constitutional principles that Joshua and his mother are denied by this court the opportunity to have their rights protected.'

As he promised, his opinions defied labels. Only the word justice applies. Justice has not only been his title, it has been his guiding light. Consider the history of which he has been a part. His tenure on the court of appeals and the Supreme Court extended through the terms of nine presidents. Fewer than 110 Americans have served on the Supreme Court, and Justice Blackmun served with 17 of them. Of the Judiciary Committee members who unanimously approved his nomination, including strong people in the Senate like John McClellan and Sam Irvin, Phil Hart, Hugh Scott, Mack Mathias, only three remain, Senators Kennedy, Byrd and Thurman. He's been part of a very lively period in American history, and he has served us well.

Let me also say on a personal note, one of the most rewarding experiences of my public life and my personal life has been the opportunity that Hillary and I have had to get to know Harry Blackmun and his wonderful wife, Dottie, who is here with us today. I have seen his passion in a private way for the people of his country, for its history, for its leaders, for its institutions, for its laws, for holding us together and moving us forward. I can only say that every one of us who serves in any capacity in public life would do very well by the people of the United States if we could bring to our work half the integrity, the passion and the love for this country that Justice Blackmun has given us on the United States Supreme Court for 24 years, and I thank him very much.

Unidentified Reporter #1: Mr. President, these are such large shoes to fill. Have you thought about the kind of person you'd want, and if you could take aback politics and the practical nature of politics, would it be possible to fill it with someone from the Senate, such as George Mitchell, without jeopardizing your programs such as health care?

Pres. CLINTON: Well, today I'd like to make just one statement about that, because I think today should be Justice Blackmun's day. We'll have a lot of time in the days ahead to discuss this. The shoes are large; the role that he has filled on this court is terribly important. I will attempt to appoint someone of genuine stature and--and largeness of ability and spirit to the court. I will try to do it in a timely fashion--in an appropriate and timely fashion--that is, within a reasonable amount of time. But I want to make sure that we have reviewed the appropriate options, and I will do that. And I think you'll--we'll have lots of time to talk about it in the days ahead. But I just don't think I should say much more today. I think this should be Justice Blackmun's day. Yes.

RITA BRAVER (White House Correspondent): Justice Blackmun has been known for his commitment to the decision of Roe vs. Wade that legalizes abortion. How important is it for the Supreme Court to keep that philosophy, toward the right to abortion? And I wondered if Justice Blackmun might say a few words about where he thinks the court might be headed on that issue?

Pres. CLINTON: Well, I don't know if he wants to talk about it. You know, of course, that--that I agree with the decision, and I think it's an important one in a very difficult and complex area of our nation's life. But again, I don't want to talk about the appointment of the new justice today.

Unidentified Reporter #2: Mr. President--Mr. President, I think you've had some advance warning that this might be coming. Could you give us how much sense of an opportunity you've had to get your process started and how far along it might be?

Pres. CLINTON: Well, I spoke a little this morning with our staff about it. We will have, I think, a good process that will involve the--Mr. Cutler, the White House counsel; the attorney general; Mr. McLarty and Mr. Leder, the two who have been overseeing our personnel decisions. I think it will proceed in a very deliberate way.

You know, Justice Blackmun referred in his letter to a conversation we had several months ago, indicating that he might--or that he intended to leave at some time during this year--or announce his intention. I frankly kept hoping he would change his mind. But I--I--I--I think we were prepared and I think we will proceed forthwith. Yes, sir. Go ahead.

Unidentified Reporter #3: Mr. President, it's for Justice Blackmun, an old friend. I thought you had taken the public position that your doctors would tell you when it was time to go. That having been so, can you say how you reached your decision to retire and would you add to that how you're going to get along without a daily fix of hate mail?

Justice BLACKMUN: I--I missed the punch line.

Pres. CLINTON: He asked how you were going to get along without your daily fix of hate mail. He offered to take some of mine.

Unidentified Reporter #4: Mr. President, do you--it took you eight months the last time. Will it take you that long this time?

Pres. CLINTON: Thank you. Thank you. Thank you. Let's go.

II. CLINTON STATEMENT/Q&A RE: WHITE RETIREMENT

PRESIDENT CLINTON: Let me say, as all of you know, I received a letter not long ago from Justice White expressing his intention to resign from the Court at the end of this term, and saying that he wanted to give me this much notice so that hopefully I could announce my intention to nominate someone, and all the hearings could be concluded in time to really prepare someone to serve at the beginning of the October term of the Court.

I called Justice White just a few moments ago and had a fine conversation with him. I've known him for nearly 20 years, and I thanked him for his service to our country. He has had a truly remarkable life, and I appreciate the fact that he cared enough about the Court as an institution to offer me a significant period of time to deliberate and still to have plenty of time to have a nominee considered by the Senate and then confirmed well in advance of the beginning of the Court's next term. So I will begin work on this tomorrow in earnest, and I will attempt to be faithful to my constitutional duties and appoint a truly outstanding American in a timely fashion.

Q Is -- (name inaudible) -- in the running, Mr. President?

PRESIDENT CLINTON: I don't want to get into personalities now. This is -- this is Mr. Justice White's day, and as I said, I never will forget sitting in the Supreme as a young attorney general and having had him already tell me that the quality of representation by the states was pretty poor, and then I had worked very hard with the lawyer from my state who was making the argument, and he sent me a note which I still have in my personal files 16 years later saying that we were doing better. (Laughs.) So that's what I'm going to try to do every day.

STAFF: Thank you.

Q Do you have a long list of possible nominees, Mr. President?

PRESIDENT CLINTON: No. The list may get longer, may get shorter. They -- we -- I did not anticipate having the opportunity to make an appointment at this early stage, so we don't have a big bank of potential nominees. I'll go to work on it tomorrow. I don't want to discuss any individuals at this point. I will do my best to pick a truly outstanding person just as soon as I can.

-Federal News Service,* REMARKS OF PRESIDENT CLINTON TO REPORTERS PRIOR TO DEPARTURE FOR ANDREWS AIR FORCE BASE WHITE HOUSE SOUTH LAWN, *03/19/93

Q Mr. President -- (inaudible) -- what you'll be looking for in a replacement for Justice White?

PRESIDENT CLINTON: I already said that in Washington. I used to (take/teach ?) constitutional law, and I think that there are few decisions that the president makes which are more weighty, more significant, which can have a greater impact on more Americans than an appointment to the Supreme Court. And I'm going to try to pick a person that has a fine mind, good judgment, wide experience in the law and in the problems of real people, and someone with a big heart.

III. BUSH STATEMENT RE: MARSHALL RETIREMENT

Justice Marshall has rendered extraordinary and distinguished service to his country as a pioneering civil rights lawyer, a judge on the US Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit, as Solicitor General, and in his tenure on the Supreme Court. His career is an inspiring example for all Americans. He grew up under segregation to achieve the highest office to which a lawyer can aspire. His accomplishments on the bench will long be remembered. We wish him the best in his retirement. I intend to nominate a successor very soon.

-Federal News Service,* STATEMENT FROM PRESIDENT BUSH RELEASED BY THE WHITE HOUSE OFFICE OF THE PRESS SECRETARY, *06/27/91

PRESIDENT BUSH: (In progress) -- move very swiftly. And I paid my respects to Justice Marshall in a statement that we put out. He served his country with great distinction.

And, you know, it was very pleasant for Barbara and me -- I knew nothing about this, of course -- but he and Mrs. Marshall were our guests up at Camp David awhile back and we had a very warm and relaxed and entertaining visit. I say "entertaining" from him; he fired off a few jokes for us. And it was very pleasant. So, in the personal relationship we feel sad about this, but he has served with -- served his country well and we're going to -- we're going to move promptly.

IV. BUSH COMMENTS RE: BRENNAN RETIREMENT

President Bush said he would meet with his top aides first thing Saturday to begin the search for a nominee to replace retired Supreme Court Justice William Brennan.

Speaking to reporters aboard Air Force One Friday night, Bush would not elaborate on judicial philosophy, but said the general decision-making process will be governed by the "broad lines" of "strict constructionist," a phrase often used to describe judicial conservatism.

Bush, who received Brennan's letter of resignation aboard Air Force One just before he left Cheyenne, Wyo., for Washington, said his White House meeting will include Attorney General Dick Thornburgh, chief of staff John Sununu and legal counsel C. Boyden Gray.

"It's so sudden that I have no time frame in mind," said Bush. "The court ... is in its summer adjournment so there is some time, but I'd like to get started on this process and hopefully have a nominee very, very soon."

Bush said it was "too early to express anything" when asked to detail the judicial philosophy he wants.

"I've always said I want somebody who will be on there not to legislate from the bench, but to faithfully interpret the Constitution, so that gives me a wide latitude. But I do not plan at this point to talk about any issues or any judicial philosophy."

Bush acknowledged that his administration has thought about possible Supreme Court appointments. "It's not like we are starting from ground zero."

-United Press International, 07/20/90

President Bush, who was notified of the Brennan resignation while on Air Force One, said the development was a "complete surprise."

"Obviously his resignation is accepted," Bush said. "I also thanked him for his distinguished service to the United States."

-United Press International, 07/20/90

Bush said he would meet with top aides this morning to "start the process of finding a successor," AP reported. The president said that he wanted the best-qualified person for the post and was "not afraid of starting a nomination fight."

-Boston Globe, 07/21/90

V. REAGAN STATEMENT RE: POWELL RETIREMENT

I have been advised today that, after 16 years on the Supreme Court bench, Justice Lewis F. Powell Jr., has announced his retirement.

Throughout his career, Justice Powell has won a reputation for intellectual balance and fair-mindedness. He is known for his courtliness and courtesy and is truly a justice's justice.

These past 16 years have been among the most momentous in the court's history. Justice Powell's personal role in the court's decisions on a wide range of issues has led one commentator to say he 'has had as powerful an influence as anyone alive' in interpreting the law of the land. I speak for all Americans in saying that his has been a wise and generous influence, and one that will be greatly missed.

The president's responsibility under Article II, Section 2 of the Constitution to nominate justices of the Supreme Court is one of the most significant duties of my office. I believe that the court should enter the next term at full strength, and so I will soon be submitting to the Senate my nomination for Justice Powell's successor.

-United Press International,* STATEMENT BY PRESIDENT REAGAN, *06/26/87

VI. REAGAN STATEMENT/Q&A RE: BURGER RETIREMENT, REHNQUIST/SCALIA NOMINATIONS:

On May 27, 1986, Chief Justice Burger advised me that he wanted to devote his full energies in the coming year to the important work of the Commission on the Bicentennial of the Constitution and for that reason would be retiring as Chief Justice of the Supreme Court as of the end of the Court's current term. Today I received with regret Chief Justice Burger's letter formally notifying me of his retirement.

And immediately after my conversation with the Chief Justice, I directed my Chief of Staff, together with the Attorney General and the Counsel of the President, to develop recommendations for a successor. And I am pleased to announce my intention to nominate William H. Rehnquist, currently an Associate Justice of the Supreme Court, as the new Chief Justice of the United States. Upon Justice Rehnquist's confirmation, I intend to nominate Antonin Scalia, currently a Judge of the United States Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit, as Justice Rehnquist's successor.

In taking this action, I am mindful of the importance of these nominations. The Supreme Court of the United States is the final arbiter of our Constitution and the meanining of our laws. The Chief Justice and the eight Associate Justices of the Court must not only be jurists of the highest competence, they must also be attentive to the rights specifically guaranteed in our Constitution and to the proper role of the courts in our democratic system. In choosing Justice Rehnquist and Judge Scalia, I have not only selected judges who are sensitive to these matters, but through their distinguished backgrounds and achievements, reflect my desire to appoint the most qualified individuals to serve in our courts.

Justice Rehnquist has been an Associate Justice of the Supreme Court since 1971, a role in which he has served with great distinction and skill. He is noted for his intellectual power, the lucidity of his opinions, and the respect he enjoys among his colleagues.

Judge Scalia has been a Judge of the United States Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit since 1982. His great personal energy, the force of his intellect, and the depth of his understanding of our constitutional jurisprudence uniquely qualify him for elevation to our highest court.

I hope the Senate will promptly consider and confirm these gifted interpreters of our laws.

And in closing, I want to say a word about Chief Justice Burger. He has led the Supreme Court for 17 years, a time of great change, and yet a period also of consolidation and stability in the decisions of the Court. Under Chief Justice Burger's guidance, the Court has remained faithful to precedent, while it sought out the principles that underlay the framers' words.

He is retiring now in order to devote his full attentions to a momentous occasion in our country's history: the observance in 1987 of the 200th Anniversary of the Constitution. This is an endeavor for which all Americans will be grateful and to which I and the members of the administration will lend our total support.

I'm proud and honored to stand here today with Chief Justice Burger, with Justice Rehnquist, and with Judge Scalia, and to discharge my constitutional responsibilities as President of the United States. Thank you all. God bless you.

Iq. Mr. President, what impact do you think this will have on the abortion issue -- perhaps the most emotional issue facing the Court?

The President. It probably won't surprise you when I tell you that I'm not going to take any questions now. Chief Justice Burger is here and available for any questions you might have of him, and I think the others of us --

Q. Are you satisfied that the Judge agrees with you on the abortion issue, though, sir?

The President. What?

Q. Are you satisfied that the Judge agrees with you on the abortion issue?

The President. I'm not going to answer any questions. If I start answering one, I'll --

Q. Mr. President, what was the process which led you to Judge Scalia? Did you know him before? Did people come to you and recommend him? What was the process?

The President. I'd previously appointed him into his present judgeship.

Q. Well, what made you think that he was the appropriate choice for this job?

Q. Well, surely you must think, sir, that he agrees with you on such issues as abortion, affirmative action, prayer in the schools?

The President. That's a question, and as you said --

Q. Why didn't you appoint Mr. Meese?

The President. I can't say no questions; I can say no answers. [Laughter]

Q. Mr. President, without a question, could you tell us a little bit about the new Justice -- whatever you can?

Mr. Wallison. n1 We'll have a background -- n1 Peter J. Wallison is Counsel to the President.

The President. There will be background material --

Q. But, I mean, for the American people, because we --

The President. -- that will be made available to you.

Q. Do you know him personally?

The President. Yes.

Q. Do you want to take questions on another subject? Have you heard from Gorbachev on the summit yet, sir?

The President. No, I think the subject today is Justice.

Q. Well, could we ask Justice Burger? Chief Justice Burger, could you --

Q. Did he recommend his successor?

The President. No, the Justice said that he would not presume to do that. He did discuss with me individuals and give me his opinion of them.

Q. Well, Mr. Chief Justice, maybe it's appropriate now to ask you to give us your thoughts after, what, since 1969 -- 17 years in the Court?

The Chief Justice. Seventeen years, yes.

Q. Sum up your tenure. What do you think you've done for this Court?

The Chief Justice. That would take me about 17 years, and you don't want to spend that much time. [Laughter]

Q. Why are you leaving the Court, sir? Could you explain a little bit why you're leaving the Court?

The Chief Justice. For one primary reason: that the 200th Anniversary of the Constitution got a late start -- the celebration got a late start. It is vastly underfinanced, and we're going to have the devil's own time trying to do the kind of a job that ought to be done for this great event.

John Warner, the Chairman of the '76 event, you remember, was drafted from his job as Secretary of the Navy, which he did not want to leave; and being an old friend, he told me, when this subject came up last year, that the job of Chairman was a full-time job. I already have two full-time jobs, as you know: a job as a Justice of the Court and the other job with all the vast administration problems. And it just isn't feasible to have three full-time jobs.

Q. Is it a matter of health, sir? I mean, people don't leave the Court except for matters of health, normally.

The Chief Justice. Well, you make the diagnosis. Do I look as though I'm falling apart? [Laughter]

Q. No, but, sir, is --

Q. Well, it's not how you look, it's how you feel. I mean, was it a matter of health, sir?

The Chief Justice. Never felt better in my life.

Q. Are you pleased with the direction that the Court has taken? How would you assess your tenure in the Court?

The Chief Justice. I wouldn't try to assess it. I leave that to other people to do it.

Q. Do you leave it with satisfaction, sir -- that you have accomplished what you set out to?

The Chief Justice. Not everything I set out to, no.

Q. Could you tell us a little bit about what you're sad not to have finished?

The Chief Justice. What I did not finish was an absolute imperative, and that's to experiment with this intermediate panel that is now pending before the Congress. It's a 5-year experiment. It won't cost any money, and that's, perhaps, why it doesn't attract much attention in Washington. It literally will cost nothing except to bring the judges from wherever they are into Washington.

Q. Did you participate in a judgment on the Gramm-Rudman ruling?

The Chief Justice. I'm going to answer this other question first.

That bill is pending. It would take about 50 cases a year off of the Supreme Court. And at the present time, if you're doing your homework -- those of you who are regulars on the Court -- you'll find that there are 50 to 100 cases denying cert, where one, two, or three Justices file a dissent and say this case ought to be taken. There are important cases that ought to be taken that aren't taken. You know, we've gone from Chief Justice Warren's first year with 65 signed opinions, and we've been running over 150 for the last 4 or 5 years. We've gone from 1,400 and some filings back in Earl Warren's day to nearly 5,000 -- nearly 100 a week. The Court's got to have some relief somewhere. I'm astonished that we haven't had some judges fall over with coronary thrombosis or some other illness of exhaustion and overwork.

But, going back specifically, the only health problem that I know I have is the one that I have had since I was 10 years old, and that's a polio back from having polio. And apart from the ordinary mental deterioration that occurs after age 40 -- [laughter] --

Q. Did you approve of the new appointment on the Court?

The Chief Justice. I beg your pardon?

Q. Do you approve of the appointment of Judge Scalia?

The Chief Justice. Well, the Constitution doesn't give the Chief Justice any authority on the subject.

Q. But do you have a personal --

The Chief Justice. I have known each of these men. I've known Justice Rehnquist as a colleague for now, what, 15 years?

Justice Rehnquist. Fifteen years, Chief.

The Chief Justice. And I've known Judge Scalia since the time he was an Assistant Attorney General. He's participated in extra judicial activities, like being a member of the American team visiting England to study some of their methods. We are not close friends. I have a high regard for each of them, a high regard.

Q. Sir, had you grown weary of being Chief Justice, sir?

The Chief Justice. No, I'm not weary of it. No, I would like to have stayed until we got some of this remedy that I told you about. But I think --

Q. Wyo aren't you?

The Chief Justice. I think the constitutional celebration is more important. And after all, there are some other people that can carry on this work. It's just up to the Senate.

Q. Can we talk to Judge Scalia and ask --

Q. Justice Rehnquist?

Q. Can we ask Judge Scalia about his background?

Q. Has the court ruled on Gramm-Rudman?

The Chief Justice. I don't know which question --

Q. Mr. Chief Justice --

Q. Mr. Chief Justice --

The Chief Justice. Have you had the Miranda warning yet? [Laughter]

Q. Mr. Chief Justice, it's suggested that you withheld the ruling on Gramm-Rudman because there was a leak, and that out of pique the court withheld the ruling. Can you enlighten us on that?

The Chief Justice. I thought that came down last week. Did you all miss it? [Laughter]

Q. Yes.

Q. Yes, tell us about it.

Q. And are you denying that you've ruled and affirmed the lower court finding of unconstitutionality of Gramm-Rudman?

The Chief Justice. Well, don't you go back and read those things. We came down a week ago?

Q. I missed it.

The Chief Justice. You missed it?

Q. Justice Rehnquist, could we ask you your thoughts about being nominated for the highest judicial post in this country?

Justice Rehnquist. Well, I'm deeply gratified by the confidence that the President has shown in me by making the nomination. I'll do my best to deserve that confidence.

Q. Mr. Rehnquist, how is your health? I hate to be a one track, but you've had some problems in the past. What --

Justice Rehnquist. I think I won't answer any further questions of the kind that might come up before the Senate confirmation committee.

Q. But you will have a more conservative court now, won't you?

Justice Rehnquist. I stand by what I said a moment ago. I'll defer all those answers till be Senate Judiciary Committee meets.

Q. Your health will be a matter of questioning then?

Q. Judge Scalia, can you share your thoughts with us as a new nominee -- as much as you can say about your philosophy?

Judge Scalia. Yes, on the substance of it, I think I'm with Justice Rehnquist. I know a good idea when I hear one. [Laughter] The --

Q. What about your personal thoughts?

Judge Scalia. My personal thoughts are -- for somebody who spent his whole professional life in the law -- getting nominated to the Supreme Court is the culmination of a dream, of course. And I'm greatly honored that the President would have such confidence in me and hope that the Senate will do so as well. And I'll certainly do whatever I can to live up to it.

Q. Did administration officials, sir, question you on your views on Rowe v. Wade?

Judge Scalia. I think I respond the way Justice Rehnquist does.

Q. No, I'm not asking your personal view --

Q. Are you a Republican?

Q. -- of that subject, sir. I'm wondering whether you were questioned before your selection was made on that subject?

Judge Scalia. If the Senate wants to ask that, they may. But I don't want to get into --

Q. Do you expect a prime controversy in the Senate confirmation?

Judge Scalia. I have no idea. I'm not a politician.

Q. Judge Rehnquist, an administrative question: How do you feel about television coverage of the Supreme Court? [Laughter]

Judge Rehnquist. You can call it an administrative question if you want to, but it comes under the same rubric that I indicated a moment ago. I'll defer all questions like that.

Q. Mr. --

Q. Would you carry on in the same tradition as Chief Justice Burger? Do you consider the mandate to carry on in the same tradition as Chief Justice Burger or would you make changes?

Judge Rehnquist. Again, I will defer those questions.

Q. Mr. Chief Justice, how --

Q. Mr. Chief Justice, some people suggest that the Supreme Court has become more sharply divided under your tenure. First of all, do you agree with that, and how would you characterize the general level of comity among the Justices today?

The Chief Justice. It has not become more sharply divided. If you go back and read the opinions over 35, 40 years, you'd find there just isn't any substance to that.

The reason there are nine people up there -- and there are days when I'd like there to be just one -- [laughter] -- the reason you have nine is to have this interchange and interplay. It goes on all the time. In the 17 years I have been there presiding over the conferences, never once, never once has a voice been raised in any discussions. They're vigorous discussions, as they should be -- always will be, I hope. We have cordial and good relations. We can disagree in a civilized way, and we do.

Q. Mr. Chief Justice --

Q. Mr. Chief Justice, since you are not going before the Senate, perhaps you can give us your views on whether these new appointments will change the philosophy or direction of the Court in the next few years.

The Chief Justice. Well, I could if I thought about it a great deal, but I haven't thought about it, so I would not entertain it.

Q. Well, you know Judge Scalia better than anybody else in this room. Give us a little sense, if you would --

The Chief Justice. No, I wouldn't say I know Judge Scalia better than anyone else in this room.

Q. Better than anyone else on this side of the room. [Laughter]

The Chief Justice. Then some of you haven't been on the job, doing your homework.

Q. We cover the White House.

Q. When did you first hear that it was going to be announced?

Q. When?

Q. Justice Burger --

The Chief Justice. I don't know, a day or two ago.

Q. And --

Q. Could you tell us --

Q. Sir, what will you miss most about being Chief Justice?

The Chief Justice. Really nothing. [Laughter]

Mr. Speakes. n2 Your press officer reminds me you have a press conference at six if you would like to save some.

n2 Larry M. Speakes, Principal Deputy Press Secretary to the President.

The Chief Justice. Yes, there's going to be a conference at six up at the Court. I dare not say that we're going to serve coffee and sandwiches, because we have only prepared coffee and sandwiches for the regulars. The reason it has to be at six is that I had agreed with Mr. -- I should know all of these famous people in television --

Mr. Speakes. Moyers.

The Chief Justice. Moyers, Bill Moyers, a talk with Bill Moyers on -- [laughter] -- just --

Q. He's going to be mad you didn't let him announce it.

The Chief Justice. -- just one subject, and that's the Bicentennial. That's the only subject I will discuss.

Q. Mr. Meese, are you disappointed that you were not nominated?

Q. Justice Burger, was your decision to retire at this time related at all to a desire to have President Reagan appoint your successor?

The Chief Justice. Well, if that had been my desire, I had quite a bit of time to wait here.

Q. Can you tell --

Q. Attorney General Meese, could you come up and talk to us for a moment, sir?

Q. Chief Justice Burger --

The Attorney General. This is the Chief Justice's conference, not mine.

Q. Chief Justice Burger, can you tell us --

Q. Can you address --

Q. -- a title something about your tendering of the resignation with the President? Did you personally come over --

The Chief Justice. I just gave it to him 10 minutes ago.

Q. And what happened? Can you tell us a little of the conversation?

The Chief Justice. He said, "Thank you," as I remember. [Laughter] I think maybe he and his staff were a little relieved. All they had was a word of mouth from me before, and if I hadn't shown up with that letter today, you'd have really had a problem. [Laughter]

Q. Chief Justice, what was the reason --

The Chief Justice. And by the way, you'll all get copies of that letter if you'd like it.

Q. Thank you.

Q. Mr. Chief Justice, what was the reason for the timing of the announcement today of the change in the Court? The President said you decided on your resignation last month. Why was it all announced today?

The Chief Justice. You'll have to ask the President that. I don't know the timing.

Q. Mr. Chief Justice, if it were not for the Bicentennial, would you've retired? When? I mean, do you have may views --

The Chief Justice. By my letter, as you will see, the effective date is July 10th. We hope to conclude the term before that, but there is always a certain amount of administrative debris to be cleared up and --

Q. But were it not for the Bicentennial, would you have retired? At what stage?

The Chief Justice. No. No, if it were not for the Bicentennial I would not have retired.

Q. What was your toughest case? Some people have suggested it was the Nixon tape case. After all, he appointed you to the Court, you joined the unanimous judgment which forced him to turn over those tapes, which were his undoing.

The Chief Justice. That was not the toughest.

Q. What was it?

The Chief Justice. I really don't known. I'd have to give you a list of about 25 or 30. In fact, a couple that are coming down very soon and that one last week that you fellows all missed -- [laughter] --

Q. No.

Q. Is that a tough one?

Q. When are we going to get --

The Chief Justice. Beg your pardon?

Q. When will we get that Gramm-Rudman opinion?

The Chief Justice. Sometime before the 10th of July, I hope.

Q. Do you think others on the Court should emulate you?

The Chief Justice. In what respect? [Laughter]

Q. Retiring? [Laughter]

Q. Judge Scalia, would you call yourself a tough Judge?

Judge Scalia. I think that's in the category of questions I think --

Q. Can you tell us when you were first approached by the administration? Just give us a sense of the timing -- when you first heard and what the feelings were?

Judge Scalia. I think if the President wants that to be known, I'm sure he'll tell you.

Q. Well, why were you picked?

Mr. Speakes. We do have a person to give you all that information if you relinquish --

Q. Well, we'd rather have it from these people, themselves.

Q. Judge Scalia, could you tell us where you want to school and what your background is?

Mr. Speakes. We have that in the bins at this very moment.

Q. But we'd love to have it on tape.

Q. Judge Scalia, many of the Judges appointed by this administration are said to have been subjected to a rigorous screening process conducted under Attorney General Meese. Were you at all -- Roe v. Wade aside -- asked any of your positions on various points of law?

Judge Scalia. I have no idea what the screening process was. And, again, you'd have to ask the Attorney General.

Q. No one spoke to you, sir?

Judge Scalia. I speak to people all the time.

Q. But I mean, there was no screening process directly with you?

Judge Scalia. I'd prefer not to answer that.

Q. Have you ever met the President of the United States before today?

Judge Scalia. Yes, I had met the President before today.

Q. On this subject of your appointment?

Q. Judge, can I ask you a question that you can answer? Can you give us the pronunciation of your name? [Laughter] I've heard it --

Judge Scalia. I'd be happy to do that -- Sca-le-a Q. First name?

Q. Mr. Chief Justice, did you at any point consider telling the President that, you know, you just don't have time to run the Bicentennial -- the Constitution -- that, in fact, you're the Chief Justice of the United States, and you'd rather do that?

The Chief Justice. Nobody that I know of could do all three of the jobs that I spoke of that I've been trying to do for this last year. One week, recently, after I had been carrying around a walking flu bug, one of my staff informed me that I had logged 105 hours that week. Now, 80 and 90 I can handle, but I'm getting a little too old for 105.

Q. Well, I think what has us all astounded here is the fact that you are the Chief Justice of the United States and you're putting that aside to handle a job that in fact is going to be over in a year.

The Chief Justice. No, 3 years.

Q. Well, 3 years, whatever. Did you figure perhaps you would let the President take that burden off of you so you could remain as Chief Justice, or were you simply weary of being Chief Justice?

The Chief Justice. No, I wasn't weary of being Chief Justice. It's a lot of fun. But I go back to what I said first. We have an inadeuate preparation for the Bicentennial of the Constitution. It's a remarkable story. It's one of the great, great stories in American history, and its our job to tell it. And we're just getting organized. We haven't got a main headquarters yet. We're scattered in three buildings. We've got, for Washington, a piddling appropriation of $12 million, and 10 years ago John Warner had over $200 million. If we're going to celebrate this thing in the proper way and have people get an understanding -- in this country and elsewhere -- about what freedom means and that this is the instrument that gave that freedom and how it works, there is a lot of work to be done. I expect to be working literally full time.

Q. You said this was the primary reason that you were resigning.

The Chief Justice. That's right.

Q. What would the secondary reason be, if any?

The Chief Justice. I didn't have a secondary reason.

Q. Mr. Meese, can you tell us how the court might change with these changes?

The Attorney General. No.

Q. Mr. Justice Rehnquist --

Q. Are you disappointed you weren't named?

The Attorney General. No.

Mr. Speakes. I think the growing consensus, if we took a vote, would be time to conclude. These gentlemen will be before the Senate, and this gentleman will be before the press this afternoon.

Q. Larry, just one question of Mr. Justice Rehnquist that perhaps he could answer without violating his duties to the Senate.

You, sir, have had a reputation more as a thinker and writer on the Court than as an administrator. Do you, too, consider it the culmination of a dream to be Chief Justice and thus have to take on all these administrative tasks?

Judge Rehnquist. I wouldn't call it the culmination of a dream, but it's not every day when you're 61 years old that you get a chance to have a new job. [Laughter] And you take on some things you don't like along with a lot of things that you do like.

The Chief Justice. In that respect, there is a perfect parallel. Bill Rehnquist is the same age I was when I was nominated back in the Garfield administration, I think it was. [Laughter]

Q. Ronald Reagan was 69 or 70 and he got a new job.

Q. Mr. Chief Justice, how have you seen the Court change philosophically during your tenure?

The Chief Justice. I think I got just part of that question. Has it changed philosophically?

Q. How, sir? How have you seen it change philosophically during your tenure?

The Chief Justice. Well, if you look over the history of the Supreme Court of the United States or of the country, you will find at different periods there are different needs and different problems and there are different answers. And then sometimes you find that an answer that you gave 2 years ago or 3 or 5 doesn't quite fit, and you adjust it. We have been doing some adjusting. That was done in the previous 15 years, but we haven't done a fraction of that adjusting that was done in the 15 years before my tenure began.

Q. Do you regret any of your decisions, sir? Any of the opinions you wrote? Would you like to change them?

The Chief Justice. I wish some of them were a little shorter. [Laughter]

Q. Just to followup on my question.

Q. Mr. Chief Justice, you've had a good relationship with the American Bar Association throughout your tenure as Chief Justice. Are you at all concerned that the ABA was not consulted, apparently, about your replacement on the Court?

The Chief Justice. I don't know anything about the procedures, not a thing. I have never understood that the appointments to the Supreme Court automatically were cleared with the American Bar. Sometimes they are consulted, and sometimes they're not.

Q. Mr. Chief Justice, if I could follow up on my question.

Mr. Speakes. Go ahead.

The Chief Justice. The last one.

Mr. Speakes. The Justice has ruled. Chief Justice has ruled -- last one.

Q. You said that there had not been nearly the changes during your tenure as in the preceding 15 years. Does that mean there was less need for change or it just did not happen?

The Chief Justice. I'll leave that to you.

Q. Okay.

The Chief Justice. Objective observers are a better judge of that than I am.

Q. Are you going to hand down Gramm-Rudman tomorrow?

The Chief Justice. I thought it was last week.

Q. Judge Scalia, can we get the pronunciation of your first name?

Judge Scalia. An-ton-in is what I've always --

Q. Antonin Scalia?

Judge Scalia. That's right.

Q. And so forth it shall be.

Judge Scalia. Well, all right. [Laughter]

Q. Does your wife know about this?

Mr. Speakes. Do you want to file?

Q. Yes.

Mr. Speakes. Okay. At 2:40 we will have the background briefing. You have the two announcements in the bins, the exchange of letters, and I believe the statement by the President all in there.

Note: The President spoke at 2 p.m. to reporters assembled in the Briefing Room at the White House.

VII. REAGAN COMMENTS RE: STEWART RETIREMENT

The president was questioned about Stewart's retirement as he was going to the Old Executive Office building Thursday.

"There will be an announcement shortly" on a replacement, Reagan said, "We won't leave that vacant."

In a campaign speech last fall, Reagan said, "One of the first Supreme Court vacancies in my administration will be filled by one of the most qualified women I can possibly find."

But asked Thursday if his nominee would be a woman, the president said, "No decision has been made yet." Was he looking for a woman, he was asked. "Always," Reagan replied.

-United Press International, 06/18/81

"Of course," President Reagan replied today, when reporters asked whether he and his talent scouts are including women on their list of possibilities for a vacant Supreme Court seat.

Reagan was questioned about his search for a nominee to succeed retiring Justice Potter Stewart as he headed toward the Oval Office after seeing off the visiting prime minister of Singapore.

The president said he and members of his administration "have been reviewing and looking at that and gathering names" for a possible successor to Stewart, who Thursday announced his retirement, effective July 3.

Asked if women are going to be included on his list, Reagan said, "Of course."

Asked by reporters if he is going to name a woman to the bench, Reagan said, "No decision has been made on a replacement." He added that women "always" were being sought.

Reagan told reporters an announcement on a replacement would be made "shortly."

But the president also has made clear he thinks justices have overstepped their authority in several court cases. "Their function is to interpret the law and not to make it," Reagan said, declaring, "I am a constitutionalist."

REV_00128213

Before: EDWARDS, Chief Judge, WILLIAMS, GINSBURG, SENTELLE, RANDOLPH, ROGERS and TATEL, Circuit Judges.

Opinion for the Court filed Per Curiam.

Per Curiam: Microsoft Corporation appeals from judgments of the District Court finding the company in violation of §§ 1 and 2 of the Sherman Act and ordering various remedies.

The action against Microsoft arose pursuant to a complaint filed by the United States and separate complaints filed by individual States. The District Court determined that Microsoft had maintained a monopoly in the market for Intel-compatible PC operating systems in violation of § 2; attempted to gain a monopoly in the market for internet browsers in violation of § 2; and illegally tied two purportedly separate products, Windows and Internet Explorer ("IE"), in violation of § 1. United States v. Microsoft Corp., 87 F. Supp. 2d 30 (D.D.C. 2000) ("Conclusions of Law"). The District Court then found that the same facts that established liability under §§ 1 and 2 of the Sherman Act mandated findings of liability under analogous state law antitrust provisions. Id. To remedy the Sherman Act violations, the District Court issued a Final Judgment requiring Microsoft to submit a proposed plan of divestiture, with the company to be split into an operating systems business and an applications business. United States v. Microsoft Corp., 97 F. Supp. 2d 59, 64-65 (D.D.C. 2000) ("Final Judgment"). The District Court's remedial order also contains a number of interim restrictions on Microsoft's conduct. Id. at 66-69.

Microsoft's appeal contests both the legal conclusions and the resulting remedial order. There are three principal aspects of this appeal. First, Microsoft challenges the District Court's legal conclusions as to all three alleged antitrust violations and also a number of the procedural and factual foundations on which they rest. Second, Microsoft argues that the remedial order must be set aside, because the District Court failed to afford the company an evidentiary hearing on disputed facts and, also, because the substantive provisions of the order are flawed. Finally, Microsoft asserts that the trial judge committed ethical violations by engaging in impermissible ex parte contacts and making inappropriate public comments on the merits of the case while it was pending. Microsoft argues that these ethical violations compromised the District Judge's appearance of impartiality, thereby necessitating his disqualification and vacatur of his Findings of Fact, Conclusions of Law, and Final Judgment.

After carefully considering the voluminous record on appeal—including the District Court's Findings of Fact and Conclusions of Law, the testimony and exhibits submitted at trial, the parties' briefs, and the oral arguments before this court—we find that some but not all of Microsoft's liability challenges have merit. Accordingly, we affirm in part and reverse in part the District Court's judgment that Microsoft violated § 2 of the Sherman Act by employing anticompetitive means to maintain a monopoly in the operating system market; we reverse the District Court's determination that Microsoft violated § 2 of the Sherman Act by illegally attempting to monopolize the internet browser market; and we remand the District Court's finding that Microsoft violated § 1 of the Sherman Act by unlawfully tying its browser to its operating system. Our judgment extends to the District Court's findings with respect to the state law counterparts of the plaintiffs' Sherman Act claims.

We also find merit in Microsoft's challenge to the Final Judgment embracing the District Court's remedial order. There are several reasons supporting this conclusion. First, the District Court's Final Judgment rests on a number of liability determinations that do not survive appellate review; therefore, the remedial order as currently fashioned cannot stand. Furthermore, we would vacate and remand the remedial order even were we to uphold the District Court's liability determinations in their entirety, because the District Court failed to hold an evidentiary hearing to address remedies-specific factual disputes.

Finally, we vacate the Final Judgment on remedies, because the trial judge engaged in impermissible ex parte contacts by holding secret interviews with members of the media and made numerous offensive comments about Microsoft officials in public statements outside of the courtroom, giving rise to an appearance of partiality. Although we find no evidence of actual bias, we hold that the actions of the trial judge seriously tainted the proceedings before the District Court and called into question the integrity of the judicial process. We are therefore constrained to vacate the Final Judgment on remedies, remand the case for reconsideration of the remedial order, and require that the case be assigned to a different trial judge on remand. We believe that this disposition will be adequate to cure the cited improprieties.

In sum, for reasons more fully explained below, we affirm in part, reverse in part, and remand in part the District Court's judgment assessing liability. We vacate in full the Final Judgment embodying the remedial order and remand the case to a different trial judge for further proceedings consistent with this opinion.

I. INTRODUCTION

A. Background

In July 1994, officials at the Department of Justice ("DOJ"), on behalf of the United States, filed suit against Microsoft, charging the company with, among other things, unlawfully maintaining a monopoly in the operating system market through anticompetitive terms in its licensing and software developer agreements. The parties subsequently entered into a consent decree, thus avoiding a trial on the merits. See United States v. Microsoft Corp., 56 F.3d 1448 (D.C. Cir. 1995) ("Microsoft I"). Three years later, the Justice Department filed a civil contempt action against Microsoft for allegedly violating one of the decree's provisions. On appeal from a grant of a preliminary injunction, this court held that Microsoft's technological bundling of IE 3.0 and 4.0 with Windows 95 did not violate the relevant provision of the consent decree. United States v. Microsoft Corp., 147 F.3d 935 (D.C. Cir. 1998) ("Microsoft II"). We expressly reserved the question whether such bundling might independently violate §§ 1 or 2 of the Sherman Act. Id. at 950 n.14.

On May 18, 1998, shortly before issuance of the Microsoft II decision, the United States and a group of State plaintiffs filed separate (and soon thereafter consolidated) complaints, asserting antitrust violations by Microsoft and seeking preliminary and permanent injunctions against the company's allegedly unlawful conduct. The complaints also sought any "other preliminary and permanent relief as is necessary and appropriate to restore competitive conditions in the markets affected by Microsoft's unlawful conduct." Gov't's Compl. at 53, United States v. Microsoft Corp., No. 98-1232 (D.D.C. 1999). Relying almost exclusively on Microsoft's varied efforts to unseat Netscape Navigator as the preeminent internet browser, plaintiffs charged four distinct violations of the Sherman Act: (1) unlawful exclusive dealing arrangements in violation of § 1; (2) unlawful tying of IE to Windows 95 and Windows 98 in violation of § 1; (3) unlawful maintenance of a monopoly in the PC operating system market in violation of § 2; and (4) unlawful attempted monopolization of the internet browser market in violation of § 2. The States also brought pendent claims charging Microsoft with violations of various State antitrust laws.

The District Court scheduled the case on a "fast track." The hearing on the preliminary injunction and the trial on the merits were consolidated pursuant to FED. R. CIV. P. 65(a)(2). The trial was then scheduled to commence on September 8, 1998, less than four months after the complaints had been filed. In a series of pretrial orders, the District Court limited each side to a maximum of 12 trial witnesses plus two rebuttal witnesses. It required that all trial witnesses' direct testimony be submitted to the court in the form of written declarations. The District Court also made allowances for the use of deposition testimony at trial to prove subordinate or predicate issues. Following the grant of three brief continuances, the trial started on October 19, 1998.

After a 76-day bench trial, the District Court issued its Findings of Fact. United States v. Microsoft Corp., 84 F. Supp. 2d 9 (D.D.C. 1999) ("Findings of Fact"). This triggered two independent courses of action. First, the District Court established a schedule for briefing on possible legal conclusions, inviting Professor Lawrence Lessig to participate as amicus curiae. Second, the District Court referred the case to mediation to afford the parties an opportunity to settle their differences. The Honorable Richard A. Posner, Chief Judge of the United States Court of Appeals for the Seventh Circuit, was appointed to serve as mediator. The parties concurred in the referral to mediation and in the choice of mediator.

Mediation failed after nearly four months of settlement talks between the parties. On April 3, 2000, with the parties' briefs having been submitted and considered, the District Court issued its conclusions of law. The District Court found Microsoft liable on the § 1 tying and § 2 monopoly maintenance and attempted monopolization claims, Conclusions of Law, at 35-51, while ruling that there was insufficient evidence to support a § 1 exclusive dealing violation, id. at 51-54. As to the pendent State actions, the District Court found the State antitrust laws conterminous with §§ 1 and 2 of the Sherman Act, thereby obviating the need for further State-specific analysis. Id. at 54-56. In those few cases where a State's law required an additional showing of intrastate impact on competition, the District Court found the requirement easily satisfied on the evidence at hand. Id. at 55.

Having found Microsoft liable on all but one count, the District Court then asked plaintiffs to submit a proposed remedy. Plaintiffs' proposal for a remedial order was subsequently filed within four weeks, along with six supplemental declarations and over 50 new exhibits. In their proposal, plaintiffs sought specific conduct remedies, plus structural relief that would split Microsoft into an applications company and an operating systems company. The District Court rejected Microsoft's request for further evidentiary proceedings and, following a single hearing on the merits of the remedy question, issued its Final Judgment on June 7, 2000. The District Court adopted plaintiffs' proposed remedy without substantive change.

Microsoft filed a notice of appeal within a week after the District Court issued its Final Judgment. This court then ordered that any proceedings before it be heard by the court sitting en banc. Before any substantive matters were addressed by this court, however, the District Court certified appeal of the case brought by the United States directly to the Supreme Court pursuant to 15 U.S.C. § 29(b), while staying the final judgment order in the federal and state cases pending appeal. The States thereafter petitioned the Supreme Court for a writ of certiorari in their case. The Supreme Court declined to hear the appeal of the Government's case and remanded the matter to this court; the Court likewise denied the States' petition for writ of certiorari. Microsoft Corp. v. United States, 530 U.S. 1301 (2000). This consolidated appeal followed.

B. Overview

Before turning to the merits of Microsoft's various arguments, we pause to reflect briefly on two matters of note, one practical and one theoretical.

The practical matter relates to the temporal dimension of this case. The litigation timeline in this case is hardly problematic. Indeed, it is noteworthy that a case of this magnitude and complexity has proceeded from the filing of complaints through trial to appellate decision in a mere three years. See, e.g., Data Gen. Corp. v. Grumman Sys. Support Corp., 36 F.3d 1147, 1155 (1st Cir. 1994) (six years from filing of complaint to appellate decision); Transamerica Computer Co., Inc. v. IBM, 698 F.2d 1377, 1381 (9th Cir. 1983) (over four years from start of trial to appellate decision); United States v. United Shoe Mach. Corp., 110 F. Supp. 295, 298 (D. Mass. 1953) (over five years from filing of complaint to trial court decision).

What is somewhat problematic, however, is that just over six years have passed since Microsoft engaged in the first conduct plaintiffs allege to be anticompetitive. As the record in this case indicates, six years seems like an eternity in the computer industry. By the time a court can assess liability, firms, products, and the marketplace are likely to have changed dramatically. This, in turn, threatens enormous practical difficulties for courts considering the appropriate measure of relief in equitable enforcement actions, both in crafting injunctive remedies in the first instance and reviewing those remedies in the second. Conduct remedies may be unavailing in such cases, because innovation to a large degree has already rendered the anticompetitive conduct obsolete (although by no means harmless). And broader structural remedies present their own set of problems, including how a court goes about restoring competition to a dramatically changed, and constantly changing, marketplace. That is just one reason why we find the District Court's refusal in the present case to hold an evidentiary hearing on remedies—to update and flesh out the available information before seriously entertaining the possibility of dramatic structural relief—so problematic. See infra Section V.

We do not mean to say that enforcement actions will no longer play an important role in curbing infringements of the antitrust laws in technologically dynamic markets, nor do we assume this in assessing the merits of this case. Even in those cases where forward-looking remedies appear limited, the Government will continue to have an interest in defining the contours of the antitrust laws so that law-abiding firms will have a clear sense of what is permissible and what is not. And the threat of private damage actions will remain to deter those firms inclined to test the limits of the law.

The second matter of note is more theoretical in nature. We decide this case against a backdrop of significant debate amongst academics and practitioners over the extent to which "old economy" § 2 monopolization doctrines should apply to firms competing in dynamic technological markets characterized by network effects. In markets characterized by network effects, one product or standard tends towards dominance, because "the utility that a user derives from consumption of the good increases with the number of other agents consuming the good." Michael L. Katz & Carl Shapiro, Network Externalities, Competition, and Compatibility, 75 AM. ECON. REV. 424, 424 (1985). For example, "[a]n individual consumer's demand to use (and hence her benefit from) the telephone network ... increases with the number of other users on the network whom she can call or from whom she can receive calls." Howard A. Shelanski & J. Gregory Sidak, Antitrust Divestiture in Network Industries, 68 U. CHI. L. REV. 1, 8 (2001). Once a product or standard achieves wide acceptance, it becomes more or less entrenched. Competition in such industries is "for the field" rather than "within the field." See Harold Demsetz, Why Regulate Utilities?, 11 J.L. & ECON. 55, 57 & n.7 (1968) (emphasis omitted).

In technologically dynamic markets, however, such entrenchment may be temporary, because innovation may alter the field altogether. See JOSEPH A. SCHUMPETER, CAPITALISM, SOCIALISM AND DEMOCRACY 81-90 (Harper Perennial 1976) (1942). Rapid technological change leads to markets in which "firms compete through innovation for temporary market dominance, from which they may be displaced by the next wave of product advancements." Shelanski & Sidak, at 11-12 (discussing Schumpeterian competition, which proceeds "sequentially over time rather than simultaneously across a market"). Microsoft argues that the operating system market is just such a market.

Whether or not Microsoft's characterization of the operating system market is correct does not appreciably alter our mission in assessing the alleged antitrust violations in the present case. As an initial matter, we note that there is no consensus among commentators on the question of whether, and to what extent, current monopolization doctrine should be amended to account for competition in technologically dynamic markets characterized by network effects. Compare Steven C. Salop & R. Craig Romaine, Preserving Monopoly: Economic Analysis, Legal Standards, and Microsoft, 7 GEO. MASON L. REV. 617, 654-55, 663-64 (1999) (arguing that exclusionary conduct in high-tech networked industries deserves heightened antitrust scrutiny in part because it may threaten to deter innovation), with Ronald A. Cass & Keith N. Hylton, Preserving Competition: Economic Analysis, Legal Standards and Microsoft, 8 GEO. MASON L. REV. 1, 36-39 (1999) (equivocating on the antitrust implications of network effects and noting that the presence of network externalities may actually encourage innovation by guaranteeing more durable monopolies to innovating winners). Indeed, there is some suggestion that the economic consequences of network effects and technological dynamism act to offset one another, thereby making it difficult to formulate categorical antitrust rules absent a particularized analysis of a given market. See Shelanski & Sidak, at 6-7 ("High profit margins might appear to be the benign and necessary recovery of legitimate investment returns in a Schumpeterian framework, but they might represent exploitation of customer lock-in and monopoly power when viewed through the lens of network economics.... The issue is particularly complex because, in network industries characterized by rapid innovation, both forces may be operating and can be difficult to isolate.").

Moreover, it should be clear that Microsoft makes no claim that anticompetitive conduct should be assessed differently in technologically dynamic markets. It claims only that the measure of monopoly power should be different. For reasons fully discussed below, we reject Microsoft's monopoly power argument. See infra Section II.A.

With this backdrop in mind, we turn to the specific challenges raised in Microsoft's appeal.

II. MONOPOLIZATION

Section 2 of the Sherman Act makes it unlawful for a firm to "monopolize." 15 U.S.C. § 2. The offense of monopolization has two elements: "(1) the possession of monopoly power in the relevant market and (2) the willful acquisition or maintenance of that power as distinguished from growth or development as a consequence of a superior product, business acumen, or historic accident." United States v. Grinnell Corp., 384 U.S. 563, 570-71 (1966). The District Court applied this test and found that Microsoft possesses monopoly power in the market for Intel-compatible PC operating systems. Focusing primarily on Microsoft's efforts to suppress Netscape Navigator's threat to its operating system monopoly, the court also found that Microsoft maintained its power not through competition on the merits, but through unlawful means. Microsoft challenges both conclusions. We defer to the District Court's findings of fact, setting them aside only if clearly erroneous. FED R. CIV. P. 52(a). We review legal questions de novo. United States ex rel. Modern Elec., Inc. v. Ideal Elec. Sec. Co., 81 F.3d 240, 244 (D.C. Cir. 1996).

We begin by considering whether Microsoft possesses monopoly power, see infra Section II.A, and finding that it does, we turn to the question whether it maintained this power through anticompetitive means. Agreeing with the District Court that the company behaved anticompetitively, see infra Section II.B, and that these actions contributed to the maintenance of its monopoly power, see infra Section II.C, we affirm the court's finding of liability for monopolization.

A. Monopoly Power

While merely possessing monopoly power is not itself an antitrust violation, see Northeastern Tel. Co. v. AT & T, 651 F.2d 76, 84-85 (2d Cir. 1981), it is a necessary element of a monopolization charge, see Grinnell, 384 U.S. at 570. The Supreme Court defines monopoly power as "the power to control prices or exclude competition." United States v. E.I. du Pont de Nemours & Co., 351 U.S. 377, 391 (1956). More precisely, a firm is a monopolist if it can profitably raise prices substantially above the competitive level. 2A PHILLIP E. AREEDA ET AL., ANTITRUST LAW ¶ 501, at 85 (1995); cf. Ball Mem'l Hosp., Inc. v. Mut. Hosp. Ins., Inc., 784 F.2d 1325, 1335 (7th Cir. 1986) (defining market power as "the ability to cut back the market's total output and so raise price"). Where evidence indicates that a firm has in fact profitably done so, the existence of monopoly power is clear. See Rebel Oil Co. v. Atl. Richfield Co., 51 F.3d 1421, 1434 (9th Cir. 1995); see also FTC v. Indiana Fed'n of Dentists, 476 U.S. 447, 460-61 (1986) (using direct proof to show market power in Sherman Act § 1 unreasonable restraint of trade action). Because such direct proof is only rarely available, courts more typically examine market structure in search of circumstantial evidence of monopoly power. 2A AREEDA ET AL., ANTITRUST LAW ¶ 531a, at 156; see also, e.g., Grinnell, 384 U.S. at 571. Under this structural approach, monopoly power may be inferred from a firm's possession of a dominant share of a relevant market that is protected by entry barriers. See

Rebel Oil, 51 F.3d at 1434. "Entry barriers" are factors (such as certain regulatory requirements) that prevent new rivals from timely responding to an increase in price above the competitive level. See S. Pac. Communications Co. v. AT & T, 740 F.2d 980, 1001-02 (D.C. Cir. 1984).

The District Court considered these structural factors and concluded that Microsoft possesses monopoly power in a relevant market. Defining the market as Intel-compatible PC operating systems, the District Court found that Microsoft has a greater than 95% share. It also found the company's market position protected by a substantial entry barrier. Conclusions of Law, at 36.

Microsoft argues that the District Court incorrectly defined the relevant market. It also claims that there is no barrier to entry in that market. Alternatively, Microsoft argues that because the software industry is uniquely dynamic, direct proof, rather than circumstantial evidence, more appropriately indicates whether it possesses monopoly power. Rejecting each argument, we uphold the District Court's finding of monopoly power in its entirety.

1. Market Structure

a. Market definition

"Because the ability of consumers to turn to other suppliers restrains a firm from raising prices above the competitive level," Rothery Storage & Van Co. v. Atlas Van Lines, Inc., 792 F.2d 210, 218 (D.C. Cir. 1986), the relevant market must include all products "reasonably interchangeable by consumers for the same purposes." du Pont, 351 U.S. at 395. In this case, the District Court defined the market as "the licensing of all Intel-compatible PC operating systems worldwide," finding that there are "currently no products—and ... there are not likely to be any in the near future—that a significant percentage of computer users worldwide could substitute for [these operating systems] without incurring substantial costs." Conclusions of Law, at 36. Calling this market definition "far too narrow," Appellant's Opening Br. at 84, Microsoft argues that the District Court improperly excluded three types of products: non-Intel compatible operating systems (primarily Apple's Macintosh operating system, Mac OS), operating systems for non-PC devices (such as handheld computers and portal websites), and "middleware" products, which are not operating systems at all.

We begin with Mac OS. Microsoft's argument that Mac OS should have been included in the relevant market suffers from a flaw that infects many of the company's monopoly power claims: the company fails to challenge the District Court's factual findings, or to argue that these findings do not support the court's conclusions. The District Court found that consumers would not switch from Windows to Mac OS in response to a substantial price increase because of the costs of acquiring the new hardware needed to run Mac OS (an Apple computer and peripherals) and compatible software applications, as well as because of the effort involved in learning the new system and transferring files to its format. Findings of Fact ¶ 20. The court also found the Apple system less appealing to consumers because it costs considerably more and supports fewer applications. Id. ¶ 21. Microsoft responds only by saying: "the district court's market definition is so narrow that it excludes Apple's Mac OS, which has competed with Windows for years, simply because the Mac OS runs on a different microprocessor." Appellant's Opening Br. at 84. This general, conclusory statement falls far short of what is required to challenge findings as clearly erroneous. Pendleton v. Rumsfeld, 628 F.2d 102, 106 (D.C. Cir. 1980); see also Terry v. Reno, 101 F.3d 1412, 1415 (D.C. Cir. 1996) (holding that claims made but not argued in a brief are waived). Microsoft neither points to evidence contradicting the District Court's findings nor alleges that supporting record evidence is insufficient. And since Microsoft does not argue that even if we accept these findings, they do not support the District Court's conclusion, we have no basis for upsetting the court's decision to exclude Mac OS from the relevant market.

Microsoft's challenge to the District Court's exclusion of non-PC based competitors, such as information appliances (handheld devices, etc.) and portal websites that host server-based software applications, suffers from the same defect:

the company fails to challenge the District Court's key factual findings. In particular, the District Court found that because information appliances fall far short of performing all of the functions of a PC, most consumers will buy them only as a supplement to their PCs. Findings of Fact ¶ 23. The District Court also found that portal websites do not presently host enough applications to induce consumers to switch, nor are they likely to do so in the near future. Id. ¶ 27. Again, because Microsoft does not argue that the District Court's findings do not support its conclusion that information appliances and portal websites are outside the relevant market, we adhere to that conclusion.

This brings us to Microsoft's main challenge to the District Court's market definition: the exclusion of middleware. Because of the importance of middleware to this case, we pause to explain what it is and how it relates to the issue before us.

Operating systems perform many functions, including allocating computer memory and controlling peripherals such as printers and keyboards. See Direct Testimony of Frederick Warren-Boulton ¶ 20, reprinted in 5 J.A. at 3172-73. Operating systems also function as platforms for software applications. They do this by "exposing"—i.e., making available to software developers—routines or protocols that perform certain widely-used functions. These are known as Application Programming Interfaces, or "APIs." See Direct Testimony of James Barksdale ¶ 70, reprinted in 5 J.A. at 2895-96. For example, Windows contains an API that enables users to draw a box on the screen. See Direct Testimony of Michael T. Devlin ¶ 12, reprinted in 5 J.A. at 3525. Software developers wishing to include that function in an application need not duplicate it in their own code. Instead, they can "call"—i.e., use—the Windows API. See Direct Testimony of James Barksdale ¶ ¶ 70-71, reprinted in 5 J.A. at 2895-97. Windows contains thousands of APIs, controlling everything from data storage to font display. See Direct Testimony of Michael Devlin ¶ 12, reprinted in 5 J.A. at 3525.

Every operating system has different APIs. Accordingly, a developer who writes an application for one operating system and wishes to sell the application to users of another must modify, or "port," the application to the second operating system. Findings of Fact ¶ 4. This process is both time-consuming and expensive. Id. ¶ 30.

"Middleware" refers to software products that expose their own APIs. Id. ¶ 28; Direct Testimony of Paul Maritz ¶ ¶ 234-36, reprinted in 6 J.A. at 3727-29. Because of this, a middleware product written for Windows could take over some or all of Windows's valuable platform functions—that is, developers might begin to rely upon APIs exposed by the middleware for basic routines rather than relying upon the API set included in Windows. If middleware were written for multiple operating systems, its impact could be even greater. The more developers could rely upon APIs exposed by such middleware, the less expensive porting to different operating systems would be. Ultimately, if developers could write applications relying exclusively on APIs exposed by middleware, their applications would run on any operating system on which the middleware was also present. See Direct Testimony of Avadis Tevanian, Jr. ¶ 45, reprinted in 5 J.A. at 3113. Netscape Navigator and Java—both at issue in this case—are middleware products written for multiple operating systems. Findings of Fact ¶ 28.

Microsoft argues that, because middleware could usurp the operating system's platform function and might eventually take over other operating system functions (for instance, by controlling peripherals), the District Court erred in excluding Navigator and Java from the relevant market. The District Court found, however, that neither Navigator, Java, nor any other middleware product could now, or would soon, expose enough APIs to serve as a platform for popular applications, much less take over all operating system functions. Id. ¶ ¶ 28-29. Again, Microsoft fails to challenge these findings, instead simply asserting middleware's "potential" as a competitor. Appellant's Opening Br. at 86. The test of reasonable interchangeability, however, required the District Court to consider only substitutes that constrain pricing in the reasonably foreseeable future, and only products that can enter the market in a relatively short time can perform this function. See Rothery, 792 F.2d at 218 ("Because the ability of consumers to turn to other suppliers restrains a firm from raising prices above the competitive level, the definition of the 'relevant market' rests on a determination of available substitutes."); see also Findings of Fact ¶ 29 ("[I]t would take several years for middleware ... to evolve" into a product that can constrain operating system pricing.). Whatever middleware's ultimate potential, the District Court found that consumers could not now abandon their operating systems and switch to middleware in response to a sustained price for Windows above the competative level. Findings of Fact ¶ ¶ 28, 29. Nor is middleware likely to overtake the operating system as the primary platform for software development any time in the near future. Id.

Alternatively, Microsoft argues that the District Court should not have excluded middleware from the relevant market because the primary focus of the plaintiffs' § 2 charge is on Microsoft's attempts to suppress middleware's threat to its operating system monopoly. According to Microsoft, it is "contradict[ory]," 2/26/2001 Ct. Appeals Tr. at 20, to define the relevant market to exclude the "very competitive threats that gave rise" to the action. Appellant's Opening Br. at 84. The purported contradiction lies between plaintiffs' § 2 theory, under which Microsoft preserved its monopoly against middleware technologies that threatened to become viable substitutes for Windows, and its theory of the relevant market, under which middleware is not presently a viable substitute for Windows. Because middleware's threat is only nascent, however, no contradiction exists. Nothing in § 2 of the Sherman Act limits its prohibition to actions taken against threats that are already well-developed enough to serve as present substitutes. See infra Section II.C. Because market definition is meant to identify products "reasonably interchangeable by consumers," du Pont, 351 U.S. at 395, and because middleware is not now interchangeable with Windows, the District Court had good reason for excluding middleware from the relevant market.

b. Market power

Having thus properly defined the relevant market, the District Court found that Windows accounts for a greater than 95% share. Findings of Fact ¶ 35. The court also found that even if Mac OS were included, Microsoft's share would exceed 80%. Id. Microsoft challenges neither finding, nor does it argue that such a market share is not predominant. Cf. Grinnell, 384 U.S. at 571 (87% is predominant); Eastman Kodak Co. v. Image Technical Servs., Inc., 504 U.S. 451, 481 (1992) (80%); du Pont, 351 U.S. at 379, 391 (75%).

Instead, Microsoft claims that even a predominant market share does not by itself indicate monopoly power. Although the "existence of [monopoly] power ordinarily may be inferred from the predominant share of the market," Grinnell, 384 U.S. at 571, we agree with Microsoft that because of the possibility of competition from new entrants, see Ball Mem'l Hosp., Inc., 784 F.2d at 1336, looking to current market share alone can be "misleading." Hunt-Wesson Foods, Inc. v. Ragu Foods, Inc., 627 F.2d 919, 924 (9th Cir. 1980); see also Ball Mem'l Hosp., Inc., 784 F.2d at 1336 ("Market share reflects current sales, but today's sales do not always indicate power over sales and price tomorrow.") In this case, however, the District Court was not misled. Considering the possibility of new rivals, the court focused not only on Microsoft's present market share, but also on the structural barrier that protects the company's future position. Conclusions of Law, at 36. That barrier—the "applications barrier to entry"—stems from two characteristics of the software market: (1) most consumers prefer operating systems for which a large number of applications have already been written; and (2) most developers prefer to write for operating systems that already have a substantial consumer base. See Findings of Fact ¶ ¶ 30, 36. This "chicken-and-egg" situation ensures that applications will continue to be written for the already dominant Windows, which in turn ensures that consumers will continue to prefer it over other operating systems. Id.

Challenging the existence of the applications barrier to entry, Microsoft observes that software developers do write applications for other operating systems, pointing out that at its peak IBM's OS/2 supported approximately 2,500 applications. Id. ¶ 46. This misses the point. That some developers write applications for other operating systems is not at all inconsistent with the finding that the applications barrier to entry discourages many from writing for these less popular platforms. Indeed, the District Court found that IBM's difficulty in attracting a larger number of software developers to write for its platform seriously impeded OS/2's success. Id. ¶ 46.

Microsoft does not dispute that Windows supports many more applications than any other operating system. It argues instead that "[i]t defies common sense" to suggest that an operating system must support as many applications as Windows does (more than 70,000, according to the District Court, id. ¶ 40) to be competitive. Appellant's Opening Br. at 96. Consumers, Microsoft points out, can only use a very small percentage of these applications. Id. As the District Court explained, however, the applications barrier to entry gives consumers reason to prefer the dominant operating system even if they have no need to use all applications written for it:

> The consumer wants an operating system that runs not only types of applications that he knows he will want to use, but also those types in which he might develop an interest later. Also, the consumer knows that if he chooses an operating system with enough demand to support multiple applications in each product category, he will be less likely to find himself straitened later by having to use an application whose features disappoint him. Finally, the average user knows that, generally speaking, applications improve through successive versions. He thus wants an operating system for which successive generations of his favorite applications will be released—promptly at that. The fact that a vastly larger number of applications are written for Windows than for other PC operating systems attracts consumers to Windows, because it reassures them that their interests will be met as long as they use Microsoft's product.

Findings of Fact ¶ 37. Thus, despite the limited success of its rivals, Microsoft benefits from the applications barrier to entry.

Of course, were middleware to succeed, it would erode the applications barrier to entry. Because applications written for multiple operating systems could run on any operating system on which the middleware product was present with little, if any, porting, the operating system market would become competitive. Id. ¶ ¶ 29, 72. But as the District Court found, middleware will not expose a sufficient number of APIs to erode the applications barrier to entry in the foreseeable future. See id. ¶ ¶ 28-29.

Microsoft next argues that the applications barrier to entry is not an entry barrier at all, but a reflection of Windows' popularity. It is certainly true that Windows may have gained its initial dominance in the operating system market competitively—through superior foresight or quality. But this case is not about Microsoft's initial acquisition of monopoly power. It is about Microsoft's efforts to maintain this position through means other than competition on the merits. Because the applications barrier to entry protects a dominant operating system irrespective of quality, it gives Microsoft power to stave off even superior new rivals. The barrier is thus a characteristic of the operating system market, not of Microsoft's popularity, or, as asserted by a Microsoft witness, the company's efficiency. See Direct Testimony of Richard Schmalensee ¶ 115, reprinted in 25 J.A. at 16153-14.

Finally, Microsoft argues that the District Court should not have considered the applications barrier to entry because it reflects not a cost borne disproportionately by new entrants, but one borne by all participants in the operating system market. According to Microsoft, it had to make major investments to convince software developers to write for its new operating system, and it continues to "evangelize" the Windows platform today. Whether costs borne by all market participants should be considered entry barriers is the subject of much debate. Compare 2A AREEDA & HOVENKAMP, ANTITRUST LAW § 420c, at 61 (arguing that these costs are entry barriers), and JOE S. BAIN, BARRIERS TO NEW COMPETITION: THEIR CHARACTER AND CONSEQUENCES IN MANUFACTURING INDUSTRIES 6-7 (1956) (considering these costs entry barriers), with L.A. Land Co. v. Brunswick Corp., 6 F.3d 1422, 1428 (9th Cir. 1993) (evaluating cost based on "[t]he disadvantage of new entrants as compared to incumbents"), and GEORGE STIGLER, THE ORGANIZATION OF INDUSTRY 67 (1968) (excluding these costs). We need not resolve this issue, however, for even under the more narrow definition it is clear that there are barriers. When Microsoft entered the operating system market with MS-DOS and the first version of Windows, it did not confront a dominant rival operating system with as massive an installed base and as vast an existing array of applications as the Windows operating systems have since enjoyed. Findings of Fact ¶ ¶ 6, 7, 43. Moreover, when Microsoft introduced Windows 95 and 98, it was able to bypass the applications barrier to entry that protected the incumbent Windows by including APIs from the earlier version in the new operating systems. See id. ¶ 44. This made porting existing Windows applications to the new version of Windows much less costly than porting them to the operating systems of other entrants who could not freely include APIs from the incumbent Windows with their own.

2. Direct Proof

Having sustained the District Court's conclusion that circumstantial evidence proves that Microsoft possesses monopoly power, we turn to Microsoft's alternative argument that it does not behave like a monopolist. Claiming that software competition is uniquely "dynamic," Appellant's Opening Br. at 84 (quoting Findings of Fact ¶ 59), the company suggests a new rule: that monopoly power in the software industry should be proven directly, that is, by examining a company's actual behavior to determine if it reveals the existence of monopoly power. According to Microsoft, not only does no such proof of its power exist, but record evidence demonstrates the absence of monopoly power. The company claims that it invests heavily in research and development, id. at 88-89 (citing Direct Testimony of Paul Maritz ¶ 155, reprinted in 6 J.A. at 3698 (testifying that Microsoft invests approximately 17% of its revenue in R&D)), and charges a low price for Windows (a small percentage of the price of an Intel-compatible PC system and less than the price of its rivals, id. at 90 (citing Findings of Fact ¶ ¶ 19, 21, 46)).

Microsoft's argument fails because, even assuming that the software market is uniquely dynamic in the long term, the District Court correctly applied the structural approach to determine if the company faces competition in the short term.

Structural market power analyses are meant to determine whether potential substitutes constrain a firm's ability to raise prices above the competitive level; only threats that are likely to materialize in the relatively near future perform this function to any significant degree. Rothery, 792 F.2d at 218 (quoting LAWRENCE SULLIVAN, ANTITRUST § 12, at 41 (1977)) (only substitutes that can enter the market "promptly" should be considered). The District Court expressly considered and rejected Microsoft's claims that innovations such as handheld devices and portal websites would soon expand the relevant market beyond Intel-compatible PC operating systems. Because the company does not challenge these findings, we have no reason to believe that prompt substitutes are available. The structural approach, as applied by the District Court, is thus capable of fulfilling its purpose even in a changing market. Microsoft cites no case, nor are we aware of one, requiring direct evidence to show monopoly power in any market. We decline to adopt such a rule now.

Even if we were to require direct proof, moreover, Microsoft's behavior may well be sufficient to show the existence of monopoly power. Certainly, none of the conduct Microsoft points to—its investment in R&D and the relatively low price of Windows—is inconsistent with the possession of such power. Conclusions of Law, at 37. The R&D expenditures Microsoft points to are not simply for Windows, but for its entire company, which most likely does not possess a monopoly for all of its products. Moreover, because innovation can increase an already dominant market share and further delay the emergence of competition, even monopolists have reason to invest in R&D. Findings of Fact ¶ 61. Microsoft's pricing behavior is similarly equivocal. The company claims only that it never charged the short-term profit-maximizing price for Windows. Faced with conflicting expert testimony, the District Court found that it could not accurately determine what this price would be. Id. ¶ 65. In any event, the court found, a price lower than the short-term profit-maximizing price is not inconsistent with possession or improper use of monopoly power. Id. ¶ ¶ 65-66. Cf. Berkey Photo, Inc. v.

Eastman Kodak Co., 603 F.2d 263, 274 (2d Cir. 1979) ("[I]f monopoly power has been acquired or maintained through improper means, the fact that the power has not been used to extract [a monopoly price] provides no succor to the monopolist."). Microsoft never claims that it did not charge the long-term monopoly price. Micosoft does argue that the price of Windows is a fraction of the price of an Intel-compatible PC system and lower than that of rival operating systems, but these facts are not inconsistent with the District Court's finding that Microsoft has monopoly power. See Findings of Fact ¶ 36 ("Intel-compatible PC operating systems other than Windows [would not] attract[ ] significant demand ... even if Micosoft held its prices substantially above the competitive level.").

More telling, the District Court found that some aspects of Microsoft's behavior are difficult to explain unless Windows is a monopoly product. For instance, according to the District Court, the company set the price of Windows without considering rivals' prices, Findings of Fact ¶ 62, something a firm without a monopoly would have been unable to do. The District Court also found that Microsoft's pattern of exclusionary conduct could only be rational "if the firm knew that it possessed monopoly power." Conclusions of Law, at 37. It is to that conduct that we now turn.

B. Anticompetitive Conduct

As discussed above, having a monopoly does not by itself violate § 2. A firm violates § 2 only when it acquires or maintains, or attempts to acquire or maintain, a monopoly by engaging in exclusionary conduct "as distinguished from growth or development as a consequence of a superior product, business acumen, or historic accident." Grinnell, 384 U.S. at 571; see also United States v. Aluminum Co. of Am., 148 F.2d 416, 430 (2d Cir. 1945) (Hand, J.) ("The successful competitor, having been urged to compete, must not be turned upon when he wins.").

In this case, after concluding that Microsoft had monopoly power, the District Court held that Microsoft had violated § 2 by engaging in a variety of exclusionary acts (not including predatory pricing), to maintain its monopoly by preventing the effective distribution and use of products that might threaten that monopoly. Specifically, the District Court held Microsoft liable for: (1) the way in which it integrated IE into

Windows; (2) its various dealings with Original Equipment Manufacturers ("OEMs"), Internet Access Providers ("IAPs"), Internet Content Providers ("ICPs"), Independent Software Vendors ("ISVs"), and Apple Computer; (3) its efforts to contain and to subvert Java technologies; and (4) its course of conduct as a whole. Upon appeal, Microsoft argues that it did not engage in any exclusionary conduct.

Whether any particular act of a monopolist is exclusionary, rather than merely a form of vigorous competition, can be difficult to discern: the means of illicit exclusion, like the means of legitimate competition, are myriad. The challenge for an antitrust court lies in stating a general rule for distinguishing between exclusionary acts, which reduce social welfare, and competitive acts, which increase it.

From a century of case law on monopolization under § 2, however, several principles do emerge. First, to be condemned as exclusionary, a monopolist's act must have an "anticompetitive effect." That is, it must harm the competitive process and thereby harm consumers. In contrast, harm to one or more competitors will not suffice. "The [Sherman Act] directs itself not against conduct which is competitive, even severely so, but against conduct which unfairly tends to destroy competition itself." Spectrum Sports, Inc. v. McQuillan, 506 U.S. 447, 458 (1993); see also Brooke Group Ltd. v. Brown & Williamson Tobacco Corp., 509 U.S. 209, 225 (1993) ("Even an act of pure malice by one business competitor against another does not, without more, state a claim under the federal antitrust laws....").

Second, the plaintiff, on whom the burden of proof of course rests, see, e.g., Monsanto Co. v. Spray-Rite Serv. Corp., 465 U.S. 752, 763 (1984); see also United States v. Arnold, Schwinn & Co., 388 U.S. 365, 374 n.5 (1967), overruled on other grounds, Cont'l T.V., Inc. v. GTE Sylvania Inc., 433 U.S. 36 (1977), must demonstrate that the monopolist's conduct indeed has the requisite anticompetitive effect. See generally Brooke Group, 509 U.S. at 225-26. In a case brought by a private plaintiff, the plaintiff must show that its injury is "of 'the type that the statute was intended to forestall,' " Brunswick Corp. v. Pueblo Bowl-O-Mat, Inc., 429 U.S. 477, 487-88 (1977) (quoting Wyandotte Transp. v. United States, 389 U.S. 191, 202 (1967)); no less in a case brought by the Government, it must demonstrate that the monopolist's conduct harmed competition, not just a competitor.

Third, if a plaintiff successfully establishes a prima facie case under § 2 by demonstrating anticompetitive effect, then the monopolist may proffer a "procompetitive justification" for its conduct. See Eastman Kodak, 504 U.S. at 483. If the monopolist asserts a procompetitive justification—a nonpretextual claim that its conduct is indeed a form of competition on the merits because it involves, for example, greater efficiency or enhanced consumer appeal—then the burden shifts back to the plaintiff to rebut that claim. Cf. Capital Imaging Assocs., P.C. v. Mohawk Valley Med. Assocs., Inc., 996 F.2d 537, 543 (2d Cir. 1993).

Fourth, if the monopolist's procompetitive justification stands unrebutted, then the plaintiff must demonstrate that the anticompetitive harm of the conduct outweighs the procompetitive benefit. In cases arising under § 1 of the Sherman Act, the courts routinely apply a similar balancing approach under the rubric of the "rule of reason." The source of the rule of reason is Standard Oil Co. v. United States, 221 U.S. 1 (1911), in which the Supreme Court used that term to describe the proper inquiry under both sections of the Act. See id. at 61-62 ("[W]hen the second section [of the Sherman Act] is thus harmonized with ... the first, it becomes obvious that the criteria to be resorted to in any given case for the purpose of ascertaining whether violations of the section have been committed, is the rule of reason guided by the established law...."). As the Fifth Circuit more recently explained, "[i]t is clear ... that the analysis under section 2 is similar to that under section 1 regardless whether the rule of reason label is applied...." Mid-Texas Communications Sys., Inc. v. AT & T, 615 F.2d 1372, 1389 n.13 (5th Cir. 1980) (citing Byars v. Bluff City News Co., 609 F.2d 843, 860 (6th Cir. 1979)); see also Cal. Computer Prods., Inc. v. IBM Corp., 613 F.2d 727, 737 (9th Cir. 1979).

Finally, in considering whether the monopolist's conduct on balance harms competition and is therefore condemned as exclusionary for purposes of § 2, our focus is upon the effect of that conduct, not upon the intent behind it. Evidence of the intent behind the conduct of a monopolist is relevant only to the extent it helps us understand the likely effect of the monopolist's conduct. See, e.g., Chicago Bd. of Trade v. United States, 246 U.S. 231, 238 (1918) ("knowledge of intent may help the court to interpret facts and to predict consequences"); Aspen Skiing Co. v. Aspen Highlands Skiing Corp., 472 U.S. 585, 603 (1985).

With these principles in mind, we now consider Microsoft's objections to the District Court's holding that Microsoft violated § 2 of the Sherman Act in a variety of ways.

1. Licenses Issued to Original Equipment Manufacturers

The District Court condemned a number of provisions in Microsoft's agreements licensing Windows to OEMs, because it found that Microsoft's imposition of those provisions (like many of Microsoft's other actions at issue in this case) serves to reduce usage share of Netscape's browser and, hence, protect Microsoft's operating system monopoly. The reason market share in the browser market affects market power in the operating system market is complex, and warrants some explanation.

Browser usage share is important because, as we explained in Section II.A above, a browser (or any middleware product, for that matter) must have a critical mass of users in order to attract software developers to write applications relying upon the APIs it exposes, and away from the APIs exposed by Windows. Applications written to a particular browser's APIs, however, would run on any computer with that browser, regardless of the underlying operating system. "The overwhelming majority of consumers will only use a PC operating system for which there already exists a large and varied set of ... applications, and for which it seems relatively certain that new types of applications and new versions of existing applications will continue to be marketed...."

Findings of Fact ¶ 30. If a consumer could have access to the applications he desired—regardless of the operating system he uses—simply by installing a particular browser on his computer, then he would no longer feel compelled to select Windows in order to have access to those applications; he could select an operating system other than Windows based solely upon its quality and price. In other words, the market for operating systems would be competitive.

Therefore, Microsoft's efforts to gain market share in one market (browsers) served to meet the threat to Microsoft's monopoly in another market (operating systems) by keeping rival browsers from gaining the critical mass of users necessary to attract developer attention away from Windows as the platform for software development. Plaintiffs also argue that Microsoft's actions injured competition in the browser market—an argument we will examine below in relation to their specific claims that Microsoft attempted to monopolize the browser market and unlawfully tied its browser to its operating system so as to foreclose competition in the browser market. In evaluating the § 2 monopoly maintenance claim, however, our immediate concern is with the anticompetitive effect of Microsoft's conduct in preserving its monopoly in the operating system market.

In evaluating the restrictions in Microsoft's agreements licensing Windows to OEMs, we first consider whether plaintiffs have made out a prima facie case by demonstrating that the restrictions have an anticompetitive effect. In the next subsection, we conclude that plaintiffs have met this burden as to all the restrictions. We then consider Microsoft's proffered justifications for the restrictions and, for the most part, hold those justifications insufficient.

a. Anticompetitive effect of the license restrictions

The restrictions Microsoft places upon Original Equipment Manufacturers are of particular importance in determining browser usage share because having an OEM pre-install a browser on a computer is one of the two most cost-effective methods by far of distributing browsing software. (The other is bundling the browser with internet access software distributed by an IAP.) Findings of Fact ¶ 145. The District Court found that the restrictions Microsoft imposed in licensing Windows to OEMs prevented many OEMs from distributing browsers other than IE. Conclusions of Law, at 39-40. In particular, the District Court condemned the license provisions prohibiting the OEMs from: (1) removing any desktop icons, folders, or "Start" menu entries; (2) altering the initial boot sequence; and (3) otherwise altering the appearance of the Windows desktop. Findings of Fact ¶ 213.

The District Court concluded that the first license restriction—the prohibition upon the removal of desktop icons, folders, and Start menu entries—thwarts the distribution of a rival browser by preventing OEMs from removing visible means of user access to IE. Id. ¶ 203. The OEMs cannot practically install a second browser in addition to IE, the court found, in part because "[p]re-installing more than one product in a given category ... can significantly increase an OEM's support costs, for the redundancy can lead to confusion among novice users." Id. ¶ 159; see also id. ¶ 217. That is, a certain number of novice computer users, seeing two browser icons, will wonder which to use when and will call the OEM's support line. Support calls are extremely expensive and, in the highly competitive original equipment market, firms have a strong incentive to minimize costs. Id. ¶ 210.

Microsoft denies the "consumer confusion" story; it observes that some OEMs do install multiple browsers and that executives from two OEMs that do so denied any knowledge of consumers being confused by multiple icons. See 11/5/98 pm Tr. at 41-42 (trial testimony of Avadis Tevanian of Apple), reprinted in 9 J.A. at 5493-94; 11/18/99 am Tr. at 69 (trial testimony of John Soyring of IBM), reprinted in 10 J.A. at 6222.

Other testimony, however, supports the District Court's finding that fear of such confusion deters many OEMs from pre-installing multiple browsers. See, e.g., 01/13/99 pm Tr. at 614-15 (deposition of Microsoft's Gayle McClain played to the court) (explaining that redundancy of icons may be confusing to end users); 02/18/99 pm Tr. at 46-47 (trial testimony of John Rose of Compaq), reprinted in 21 J.A. at 14237-38 (same); 11/17/98 am Tr. at 68 (deposition of John Kies of Packard Bell-NEC played to the court), reprinted in 9 J.A. at 6016 (same); 11/17/98 am Tr. at 67-72 (trial testimony of Glenn Weadock), reprinted in 9 J.A. at 6015-20 (same). Most telling, in presentations to OEMs, Microsoft itself represented that having only one icon in a particular category would be "less confusing for endusers." See Government's Trial Exhibit ("GX") 319 at MS98 0109453. Accordingly, we reject Microsoft's argument that we should vacate the District Court's Finding of Fact 159 as it relates to consumer confusion.

As noted above, the OEM channel is one of the two primary channels for distribution of browsers. By preventing OEMs from removing visible means of user access to IE, the license restriction prevents many OEMs from pre-installing a rival browser and, therefore, protects Microsoft's monopoly from the competition that middleware might otherwise present. Therefore, we conclude that the license restriction at issue is anticompetitive. We defer for the moment the question whether that anticompetitive effect is outweighed by Microsoft's proffered justifications.

The second license provision at issue prohibits OEMs from modifying the initial boot sequence—the process that occurs the first time a consumer turns on the computer. Prior to the imposition of that restriction, "among the programs that many OEMs inserted into the boot sequence were Internet sign-up procedures that encouraged users to choose from a list of IAPs assembled by the OEM." Findings of Fact ¶ 210. Microsoft's prohibition on any alteration of the boot sequence thus prevents OEMs from using that process to promote the services of IAPs, many of which—at least at the time Microsoft imposed the restriction—used Navigator rather than IE in their internet access software. See id. ¶ 212; GX 295, reprinted in 12 J.A. at 14533 (Upon learning of OEM practices including boot sequence modification, Microsoft's Chairman, Bill Gates, wrote: "Apparently a lot of OEMs are bundling non-Microsoft browsers and coming up with offerings together with [IAPs] that get displayed on their machines in a FAR more prominent way than MSN or our Internet browser."). Microsoft does not deny that the prohibition on modifying the boot sequence has the effect of decreasing competition against IE by preventing OEMs from promoting rivals' browsers. Because this prohibition has a substantial effect in protecting Microsoft's market power, and does so through a means other than competition on the merits, it is anticompetitive. Again the question whether the provision is nonetheless justified awaits later treatment.

Finally, Microsoft imposes several additional provisions that, like the prohibition on removal of icons, prevent OEMs from making various alterations to the desktop: Microsoft prohibits OEMs from causing any user interface other than the Windows desktop to launch automatically, from adding icons or folders different in size or shape from those supplied by Microsoft, and from using the "Active Desktop" feature to promote third-party brands. These restrictions impose significant costs upon the OEMs; prior to Microsoft's prohibiting the practice, many OEMs would change the appearance of the desktop in ways they found beneficial. See, e.g., Findings of Fact ¶ 214; GX 309, reprinted in 22 J.A. at 14551 (March 1997 letter from Hewlett-Packard to Microsoft: "We are responsible for the cost of technical support of our customers, including the 33% of calls we get related to the lack of quality or confusion generated by your product.... We must have more ability to decide how our system is presented to our end users. If we had a choice of another supplier, based on your actions in this area, I assure you [that you] would not be our supplier of choice.").

The dissatisfaction of the OEM customers does not, of course, mean the restrictions are anticompetitive. The anticompetitive effect of the license restrictions is, as Microsoft itself recognizes, that OEMs are not able to promote rival browsers, which keeps developers focused upon the APIs in Windows. Findings of Fact ¶ 212 (quoting Microsoft's Gates as writing, "[w]inning Internet browser share is a very very important goal for us," and emphasizing the need to prevent OEMs from promoting both rival browsers and IAPs that might use rivals' browsers); see also 01/13/99 Tr. at 305-06

(excerpts from deposition of James Von Holle of Gateway) (prior to restriction Gateway had pre-installed non-IE internet registration icon that was larger than other desktop icons). This kind of promotion is not a zero-sum game; but for the restrictions in their licenses to use Windows, OEMs could promote multiple IAPs and browsers. By preventing the OEMs from doing so, this type of license restriction, like the first two restrictions, is anticompetitive: Microsoft reduced rival browsers' usage share not by improving its own product but, rather, by preventing OEMs from taking actions that could increase rivals' share of usage.

b. Microsoft's justifications for the license restrictions

Microsoft argues that the license restrictions are legally justified because, in imposing them, Microsoft is simply "exercising its rights as the holder of valid copyrights." Appellant's Opening Br. at 102. Microsoft also argues that the licenses "do not unduly restrict the opportunities of Netscape to distribute Navigator in any event." Id.

Microsoft's primary copyright argument borders upon the frivolous. The company claims an absolute and unfettered right to use its intellectual property as it wishes: "[I]f intellectual property rights have been lawfully acquired," it says, then "their subsequent exercise cannot give rise to antitrust liability." Appellant's Opening Br. at 105. That is no more correct than the proposition that use of one's personal property, such as a baseball bat, cannot give rise to tort liability. As the Federal Circuit succinctly stated: "Intellectual property rights do not confer a privilege to violate the antitrust laws." In re Indep. Serv. Orgs. Antitrust Litig., 203 F.3d 1322, 1325 (Fed. Cir. 2000).

Although Microsoft never overtly retreats from its bold and incorrect position on the law, it also makes two arguments to the effect that it is not exercising its copyright in an unreasonable manner, despite the anticompetitive consequences of the license restrictions discussed above. In the first variation upon its unqualified copyright defense, Microsoft cites two cases indicating that a copyright holder may limit a licensee's ability to engage in significant and deleterious alterations of a copyrighted work. See Gilliam v. ABC, 538 F.2d 14, 21 (2d Cir. 1976); WGN Cont'l Broad. Co. v. United Video, Inc., 693 F.2d 622, 625 (7th Cir. 1982). The relevance of those two cases for the present one is limited, however, both because those cases involved substantial alterations of a copyrighted work, see Gilliam, 538 F.2d at 18, and because in neither case was there any claim that the copyright holder was, in asserting its rights, violating the antitrust laws, see WGN Cont'l Broad., 693 F.2d at 626; see also Cmty. for Creative Non-Violence v. Reid, 846 F.2d 1485, 1498 (D.C. Cir. 1988) (noting, again in a context free of any antitrust concern, that "an author [ ] may have rights against" a licensee that "excessively mutilated or altered" the copyrighted work).

The only license restriction Microsoft seriously defends as necessary to prevent a "substantial alteration" of its copyrighted work is the prohibition on OEMs automatically launching a substitute user interface upon completion of the boot process. See Findings of Fact ¶ 211 ("[A] few large OEMs developed programs that ran automatically at the conclusion of a new PC system's first boot sequence. These programs replaced the Windows desktop either with a user interface designed by the OEM or with Navigator's user interface."). We agree that a shell that automatically prevents the Windows desktop from ever being seen by the user is a drastic alteration of Microsoft's copyrighted work, and outweighs the marginal anticompetitive effect of prohibiting the OEMs from substituting a different interface automatically upon completion of the initial boot process. We therefore hold that this particular restriction is not an exclusionary practice that violates § 2 of the Sherman Act.

In a second variation upon its copyright defense, Microsoft argues that the license restrictions merely prevent OEMs from taking actions that would reduce substantially the value of Microsoft's copyrighted work: that is, Microsoft claims each license restriction in question is necessary to prevent OEMs from so altering Windows as to undermine "the principal value of Windows as a stable and consistent platform that supports a broad range of applications and that is familiar to users." Appellant's Opening Br. at 102. Microsoft, however, never substantiates this claim, and, because an OEM's altering the appearance of the desktop or promoting programs in the boot sequence does not affect the code already in the product, the practice does not self-evidently affect either the "stability" or the "consistency" of the platform. See Conclusions of Law, at 41; Findings of Fact ¶ 227. Microsoft cites only one item of evidence in support of its claim that the OEMs' alterations were decreasing the value of Windows. Defendant's Trial Exhibit ("DX") 2395 at MSV0009378A, reprinted in 19 J.A. at 12575. That document, prepared by Microsoft itself, states: "there are quality issues created by OEMs who are too liberal with the pre-install process," referring to the OEMs' installation of Windows and additional software on their PCs, which the document says may result in "user concerns and confusion." To the extent the OEMs' modifications cause consumer confusion, of course, the OEMs bear the additional support costs. See Findings of Fact ¶ 159. Therefore, we conclude Microsoft has not shown that the OEMs' liberality reduces the value of Windows except in the sense that their promotion of rival browsers undermines Microsoft's monopoly—and that is not a permissible justification for the license restrictions.

Apart from copyright, Microsoft raises one other defense of the OEM license agreements: It argues that, despite the restrictions in the OEM license, Netscape is not completely blocked from distributing its product. That claim is insufficient to shield Microsoft from liability for those restrictions because, although Microsoft did not bar its rivals from all means of distribution, it did bar them from the cost-efficient ones.

In sum, we hold that with the exception of the one restriction prohibiting automatically launched alternative interfaces, all the OEM license restrictions at issue represent uses of Microsoft's market power to protect its monopoly, unredeemed by any legitimate justification. The restrictions therefore violate § 2 of the Sherman Act.

2. Integration of IE and Windows

Although Microsoft's license restrictions have a significant effect in closing rival browsers out of one of the two primary channels of distribution, the District Court found that "Microsoft's executives believed ... its contractual restrictions placed on OEMs would not be sufficient in themselves to reverse the direction of Navigator's usage share. Consequently, in late 1995 or early 1996, Microsoft set out to bind [IE] more tightly to Windows 95 as a technical matter." Findings of Fact ¶ 160.

Technologically binding IE to Windows, the District Court found, both prevented OEMs from pre-installing other browsers and deterred consumers from using them. In particular, having the IE software code as an irremovable part of Windows meant that pre-installing a second browser would "increase an OEM's product testing costs," because an OEM must test and train its support staff to answer calls related to every software product preinstalled on the machine; moreover, pre-installing a browser in addition to IE would to many OEMs be "a questionable use of the scarce and valuable space on a PC's hard drive." Id. ¶ 159.

Although the District Court, in its Conclusions of Law, broadly condemned Microsoft's decision to bind "Internet Explorer to Windows with ... technological shackles," Conclusions of Law, at 39, its findings of fact in support of that conclusion center upon three specific actions Microsoft took to weld IE to Windows: excluding IE from the "Add/Remove Programs" utility; designing Windows so as in certain circumstances to override the user's choice of a default browser other than IE; and commingling code related to browsing and other code in the same files, so that any attempt to delete the files containing IE would, at the same time, cripple the operating system. As with the license restrictions, we consider first whether the suspect actions had an anticompetitive effect, and then whether Microsoft has provided a procompetitive justification for them.

a. Anticompetitive effect of integration

As a general rule, courts are properly very skeptical about claims that competition has been harmed by a dominant firm's product design changes. See, e.g., Foremost Pro Color, Inc. v. Eastman Kodak Co., 703 F.2d 534, 544-45 (9th Cir. 1983). In a competitive market, firms routinely innovate in the hope of appealing to consumers, sometimes in the process making their products incompatible with those of rivals; the imposition of liability when a monopolist does the same thing will inevitably deter a certain amount of innovation. This is all the more true in a market, such as this one, in which the product itself is rapidly changing. See Findings of Fact ¶ 59. Judicial deference to product innovation, however, does not mean that a monopolist's product design decisions are per se lawful. See Foremost Pro Color, 703 F.2d at 545; see also Cal. Computer Prods., 613 F.2d at 739, 744; In re IBM Peripheral EDP Devices Antitrust Litig., 481 F. Supp. 965, 1007-08 (N.D. Cal. 1979).

The District Court first condemned as anticompetitive Microsoft's decision to exclude IE from the "Add/Remove Programs" utility in Windows 98. Findings of Fact ¶ 170. Microsoft had included IE in the Add/Remove Programs utility in Windows 95, see id. ¶ ¶ 175-76, but when it modified Windows 95 to produce Windows 98, it took IE out of the Add/Remove Programs utility. This change reduces the usage share of rival browsers not by making Microsoft's own browser more attractive to consumers but, rather, by discouraging OEMs from distributing rival products. See id. ¶ 159. Because Microsoft's conduct, through something other than competition on the merits, has the effect of significantly reducing usage of rivals' products and hence protecting its own operating system monopoly, it is anticompetitive; we defer for the moment the question whether it is nonetheless justified.

Second, the District Court found that Microsoft designed Windows 98 "so that using Navigator on Windows 98 would have unpleasant consequences for users" by, in some circumstances, overriding the user's choice of a browser other than IE as his or her default browser. Id. ¶ ¶ 171-72. Plaintiffs argue that this override harms the competitive process by deterring consumers from using a browser other than IE even though they might prefer to do so, thereby reducing rival browsers' usage share and, hence, the ability of rival browsers to draw developer attention away from the APIs exposed by Windows. Microsoft does not deny, of course, that overriding the user's preference prevents some people from using other browsers. Because the override reduces rivals' usage share and protects Microsoft's monopoly, it too is anticompetitive.

Finally, the District Court condemned Microsoft's decision to bind IE to Windows 98 "by placing code specific to Web browsing in the same files as code that provided operating system functions." Id. ¶ 161; see also id. ¶ ¶ 174, 192. Putting code supplying browsing functionality into a file with code supplying operating system functionality "ensure[s] that the deletion of any file containing browsing-specific routines would also delete vital operating system routines and thus cripple Windows...." Id. ¶ 164. As noted above, preventing an OEM from removing IE deters it from installing a second browser because doing so increases the OEM's product testing and support costs; by contrast, had OEMs been able to remove IE, they might have chosen to pre-install Navigator alone. See id. ¶ 159.

Microsoft denies, as a factual matter, that it commingled browsing and non-browsing code, and it maintains the District Court's findings to the contrary are clearly erroneous. According to Microsoft, its expert "testified without contradiction that '[t]he very same code in Windows 98 that provides Web browsing functionality' also performs essential operating system functions—not code in the same files, but the very same software code." Appellant's Opening Br. at 79 (citing 5 J.A. 3291-92).

Microsoft's expert did not testify to that effect "without contradiction," however. A Government expert, Glenn Weadock, testified that Microsoft "design[ed] [IE] so that some of the code that it uses co-resides in the same library files as other code needed for Windows." Direct Testimony ¶ 30. Another Government expert likewise testified that one library file, SHDOCVW.DLL, "is really a bundle of separate functions. It contains some functions that have to do specifically with Web browsing, and it contains some general user interface functions as well." 12/14/98 am Tr. at 60-61 (trial testimony of Edward Felten), reprinted in 11 J.A. at 6953-54. One of Microsoft's own documents suggests as much. See Plaintiffs' Proposed Findings of Fact ¶ 131.2.vii (citing GX 1686 (under seal) (Microsoft document indicating some functions in SHDOCVW.DLL can be described as "IE only," others can be described as "shell only" and still others can be described as providing both "IE" and "shell" functions)).

In view of the contradictory testimony in the record, some of which supports the District Court's finding that Microsoft commingled browsing and non-browsing code, we cannot conclude that the finding was clearly erroneous. See Anderson v. City of Bessemer City, 470 U.S. 564, 573-74 (1985) ("If the district court's account of the evidence is plausible in light of the record viewed in its entirety, the court of appeals may not reverse it even though convinced that had it been sitting as the trier of fact, it would have weighed the evidence differently."). Accordingly, we reject Microsoft's argument that we should vacate Finding of Fact 159 as it relates to the commingling of code, and we conclude that such commingling has an anticompetitive effect; as noted above, the commingling deters OEMs from pre-installing rival browsers, thereby reducing the rivals' usage share and, hence, developers' interest in rivals' APIs as an alternative to the API set exposed by Microsoft's operating system.

b. Microsoft's justifications for integration

Microsoft proffers no justification for two of the three challenged actions that it took in integrating IE into Windows—excluding IE from the Add/Remove Programs utility and commingling browser and operating system code. Although Microsoft does make some general claims regarding the benefits of integrating the browser and the operating system, see, e.g., Direct Testimony of James Allchin ¶ 94, reprinted in 5 J.A. at 3321 ("Our vision of deeper levels of technical integration is highly efficient and provides substantial benefits to customers and developers."), it neither specifies nor substantiates those claims. Nor does it argue that either excluding IE from the Add/Remove Programs utility or commingling code achieves any integrative benefit. Plaintiffs plainly made out a prima facie case of harm to competition in the operating system market by demonstrating that Microsoft's actions increased its browser usage share and thus protected its operating system monopoly from a middleware threat and, for its part, Microsoft failed to meet its burden of showing that its conduct serves a purpose other than protecting its operating system monopoly. Accordingly, we hold that Microsoft's exclusion of IE from the Add/Remove Programs utility and its commingling of browser and operating system code constitute exclusionary conduct, in violation of § 2.

As for the other challenged act that Microsoft took in integrating IE into Windows—causing Windows to override the user's choice of a default browser in certain circumstances—Microsoft argues that it has "valid technical reasons." Specifically, Microsoft claims that it was necessary to design Windows to override the user's preferences when he or she invokes one of "a few" out "of the nearly 30 means of accessing the Internet." Appellant's Opening Br. at 82. According to Microsoft:

> The Windows 98 Help system and Windows Update feature depend on ActiveX controls not supported by Navigator, and the now-discontinued Channel Bar utilized Microsoft's Channel Definition Format, which Navigator also did not support. Lastly, Windows 98 does not invoke Navigator if a user accesses the Internet through "My Computer" or "Windows Explorer" because doing so would defeat one of the purposes of those features—enabling users to move seamlessly from local storage devices to the Web in the same browsing window.

Id. (internal citations omitted). The plaintiff bears the burden not only of rebutting a proffered justification but also of demonstrating that the anticompetitive effect of the challenged action outweighs it. In the District Court, plaintiffs appear to have done neither, let alone both; in any event, upon appeal, plaintiffs offer no rebuttal whatsoever. Accordingly, Microsoft may not be held liable for this aspect of its product design.

3. Agreements with Internet Access Providers

The District Court also condemned as exclusionary Microsoft's agreements with various IAPs. The IAPs include both Internet Service Providers, which offer consumers internet access, and Online Services ("OLSs") such as America Online ("AOL"), which offer proprietary content in addition to internet access and other services. Findings of Fact ¶ 15. The District Court deemed Microsoft's agreements with the IAPs unlawful because:

> Microsoft licensed [IE] and the [IE] Access Kit [(of which, more below)] to hundreds of IAPs for no charge. [Findings of Fact] ¶ ¶ 250-51. Then, Microsoft extended valuable promotional treatment to the ten most important IAPs in exchange for their commitment to promote and distribute [IE] and to exile Navigator from the desktop. Id. ¶ ¶ 255-58, 261, 272, 288-90, 305-06. Finally, in exchange for efforts to upgrade existing subscribers to client software that came bundled with [IE] instead of Navigator, Microsoft granted rebates—and in some cases made outright payments—to those same IAPs. Id. ¶ ¶ 259-60, 295.

Conclusions of Law, at 41.

The District Court condemned Microsoft's actions in (1) offering IE free of charge to IAPs and (2) offering IAPs a bounty for each customer the IAP signs up for service using the IE browser. In effect, the court concluded that Microsoft is acting to preserve its monopoly by offering IE to IAPs at an attractive price. Similarly, the District Court held Microsoft liable for (3) developing the IE Access Kit ("IEAK"), a software package that allows an IAP to "create a distinctive identity for its service in as little as a few hours by customizing the [IE] title bar, icon, start and search pages," Findings of Fact ¶ 249, and (4) offering the IEAK to IAPs free of charge, on the ground that those acts, too, helped Microsoft preserve its monopoly. Conclusions of Law, at 41-42. Finally, the District Court found that (5) Microsoft agreed to provide easy access to IAPs' services from the Windows desktop in return for the IAPs' agreement to promote IE exclusively and to keep shipments of internet access software using Navigator under a specific percentage, typically 25%. See Conclusions of Law, at 42 (citing Findings of Fact ¶ ¶ 258, 262, 289). We address the first four items—Microsoft's inducements—and then its exclusive agreements with IAPs.

Although offering a customer an attractive deal is the hallmark of competition, the Supreme Court has indicated that in very rare circumstances a price may be unlawfully low, or "predatory." See generally Brooke Group, 509 U.S. at 220-27. Plaintiffs argued before the District Court that Microsoft's pricing was indeed predatory; but instead of making the usual predatory pricing argument—that the predator would drive out its rivals by pricing below cost on a particular product and then, sometime in the future, raise its prices on that product above the competitive level in order to recoup its earlier losses—plaintiffs argued that by pricing below cost on IE (indeed, even paying people to take it), Microsoft was able simultaneously to preserve its stream of monopoly profits on Windows, thereby more than recouping its investment in below-cost pricing on IE. The District Court did not assign liability for predatory pricing, however, and plaintiffs do not press this theory on appeal.

The rare case of price predation aside, the antitrust laws do not condemn even a monopolist for offering its product at an attractive price, and we therefore have no warrant to condemn Microsoft for offering either IE or the IEAK free of charge or even at a negative price. Likewise, as we said above, a monopolist does not violate the Sherman Act simply by developing an attractive product. See Grinnell, 384 U.S. at 571 ("[G]rowth or development as a consequence of a superior product [or] business acumen" is no violation.). Therefore, Microsoft's development of the IEAK does not violate the Sherman Act.

We turn now to Microsoft's deals with IAPs concerning desktop placement. Microsoft concluded these exclusive agreements with all "the leading IAPs," Findings of Fact ¶ 244, including the major OLSs. Id. ¶ 245; see also id. ¶ ¶ 305, 306. The most significant of the OLS deals is with AOL, which, when the deal was reached, "accounted for a substantial portion of all existing Internet access subscriptions and ... attracted a very large percentage of new IAP subscribers." Id. ¶ 272. Under that agreement Microsoft puts the AOL icon in the OLS folder on the Windows desktop and AOL does not promote any non-Microsoft browser, nor provide software using any non-Microsoft browser except at the customer's request, and even then AOL will not supply more than 15% of its subscribers with a browser other than IE. Id. ¶ 289.

The Supreme Court most recently considered an antitrust challenge to an exclusive contract in Tampa Electric Co. v. Nashville Coal Co., 365 U.S. 320 (1961). That case, which involved a challenge to a requirements contract, was brought under § 3 of the Clayton Act and §§ 1 and 2 of the Sherman Act. The Court held that an exclusive contract does not violate the Clayton Act unless its probable effect is to "foreclose competition in a substantial share of the line of commerce affected." Id. at 327. The share of the market foreclosed is important because, for the contract to have an adverse effect upon competition, "the opportunities for other traders to enter into or remain in that market must be significantly limited." Id. at 328. Although "[n]either the Court of Appeals nor the District Court [had] considered in detail the question of the relevant market," id. at 330, the Court in Tampa Electric examined the record and, after defining the relevant market, determined that the contract affected less than one percent of that market. Id. at 333. After concluding, under the Clayton Act, that this share was "conservatively speaking, quite insubstantial," id., the Court went on summarily to reject the Sherman Act claims. Id. at 335 ("[I]f [the contract] does not fall within the broader prescription of § 3 of the Clayton Act it follows that it is not forbidden by those of the [Sherman Act].").

Following Tampa Electric, courts considering antitrust challenges to exclusive contracts have taken care to identify the share of the market foreclosed. Some courts have indicated that § 3 of the Clayton Act and § 1 of the Sherman Act require an equal degree of foreclosure before prohibiting exclusive contracts. See, e.g., Roland Mach. Co. v. Dresser Indus., Inc., 749 F.2d 380, 393 (7th Cir. 1984) (Posner, J.). Other courts, however, have held that a higher market share must be foreclosed in order to establish a violation of the Sherman Act as compared to the Clayton Act. See, e.g., Barr Labs. v. Abbott Labs., 978 F.2d 98, 110 (3d Cir.1992); 11 HERBERT HOVENKAMP, ANTITRUST LAW ¶ 1800c4 (1998) ("[T]he cases are divided, with a likely majority stating that the

Though what is "significant" may vary depending upon the antitrust provision under which an exclusive deal is challenged, it is clear that in all cases the plaintiff must both define the relevant market and prove the degree of foreclosure. This is a prudential requirement; exclusivity provisions in contracts may serve many useful purposes. See, e.g., Omega Envtl., Inc. v. Gilbarco, Inc., 127 F.3d 1157, 1162 (9th Cir. 1997) ("There are, however, well-recognized economic benefits to exclusive dealing arrangements, including the enhancement of interbrand competition."); Barry Wright Corp. v. ITT Grinnell Corp., 724 F.2d 227, 236 (1st Cir. 1983) (Breyer, J.) ("[V]irtually every contract to buy 'forecloses' or 'excludes' alternative sellers from some portion of the market, namely the portion consisting of what was bought."). Permitting an antitrust action to proceed any time a firm enters into an exclusive deal would both discourage a presumptively legitimate business practice and encourage costly antitrust actions. Because an exclusive deal affecting a small fraction of a market clearly cannot have the requisite harmful effect upon competition, the requirement of a significant degree of foreclosure serves a useful screening function. Cf. Frank H. Easterbrook, The Limits of Antitrust, 63 TEX. L. REV. 1, 21-23 (1984) (discussing use of presumptions in antitrust law to screen out cases in which loss to consumers and economy is likely outweighed by cost of inquiry and risk of deterring procompetitive behavior).

In this case, plaintiffs challenged Microsoft's exclusive dealing arrangements with the IAPs under both §§ 1 and 2 of the Sherman Act. The District Court, in analyzing the § 1 claim, stated, "unless the evidence demonstrates that Microsoft's agreements excluded Netscape altogether from access to roughly forty percent of the browser market, the Court should decline to find such agreements in violation of § 1." Conclusions of Law, at 52. The court recognized that Microsoft had substantially excluded Netscape from "the most efficient channels for Navigator to achieve browser usage share," id. at 53; see also Findings of Fact ¶ 145 ("[N]o other distribution channel for browsing software even approaches the efficiency of OEM pre-installation and IAP bundling."), and had relegated it to more costly and less effective methods (such as mass mailing its browser on a disk or offering it for download over the internet); but because Microsoft has not "completely excluded Netscape" from reaching any potential user by some means of distribution, however ineffective, the court concluded the agreements do not violate § 1. Conclusions of Law, at 53. Plaintiffs did not cross-appeal this holding.

Turning to § 2, the court stated: "the fact that Microsoft's arrangements with various [IAPs and other] firms did not foreclose enough of the relevant market to constitute a § 1 violation in no way detracts from the Court's assignment of liability for the same arrangements under § 2.... [A]ll of Microsoft's agreements, including the non-exclusive ones, severely restricted Netscape's access to those distribution channels leading most efficiently to the acquisition of browser usage share." Conclusions of Law, at 53.

On appeal Microsoft argues that "courts have applied the same standard to alleged exclusive dealing agreements under both Section 1 and Section 2," Appellant's Opening Br. at 109, and it argues that the District Court's holding of no liability under § 1 necessarily precludes holding it liable under § 2. The District Court appears to have based its holding with respect to § 1 upon a "total exclusion test" rather than the 40% standard drawn from the caselaw. Even assuming the holding is correct, however, we nonetheless reject Microsoft's contention.

The basic prudential concerns relevant to §§ 1 and 2 are admittedly the same: exclusive contracts are commonplace—particularly in the field of distribution—in our competitive, market economy, and imposing upon a firm with market power the risk of an antitrust suit every time it enters into such a contract, no matter how small the effect, would create an unacceptable and unjustified burden upon any such firm. At the same time, however, we agree with plaintiffs that a monopolist's use of exclusive contracts, in certain circumstances, may give rise to a § 2 violation even though the contracts foreclose less than the roughly 40% or 50% share usually required in order to establish a § 1 violation. See generally Dennis W. Carlton, A General Analysis of Exclusionary Conduct and Refusal to Deal—Why Aspen and Kodak Are Misguided, 68 ANTITRUST L.J. 659 (2001) (explaining various scenarios under which exclusive dealing, particularly by a dominant firm, may raise legitimate concerns about harm to competition).

In this case, plaintiffs allege that, by closing to rivals a substantial percentage of the available opportunities for browser distribution, Microsoft managed to preserve its monopoly in the market for operating systems. The IAPs constitute one of the two major channels by which browsers can be distributed. Findings of Fact ¶ 242. Microsoft has exclusive deals with "fourteen of the top fifteen access providers in North America[, which] account for a large majority of all Internet access subscriptions in this part of the world." Id. ¶ 308. By ensuring that the "majority" of all IAP subscribers are offered IE either as the default browser or as the only browser, Microsoft's deals with the IAPs clearly have a significant effect in preserving its monopoly; they help keep usage of Navigator below the critical level necessary for Navigator or any other rival to pose a real threat to Microsoft's monopoly. See, e.g., id. ¶ 143 (Microsoft sought to "divert enough browser usage from Navigator to neutralize it as a platform."); see also Carlton, at 670.

Plaintiffs having demonstrated a harm to competition, the burden falls upon Microsoft to defend its exclusive dealing contracts with IAPs by providing a procompetitive justification for them. Significantly, Microsoft's only explanation for its exclusive dealing is that it wants to keep developers focused upon its APIs—which is to say, it wants to preserve its power in the operating system market. 02/26/01 Ct. Appeals Tr. at 45-47. That is not an unlawful end, but neither is it a procompetitive justification for the specific means here in question, namely exclusive dealing contracts with IAPs. Accordingly, we affirm the District Court's decision holding that Microsoft's exclusive contracts with IAPs are exclusionary devices, in violation of § 2 of the Sherman Act.

4. Dealings with Internet Content Providers, Independent Software Vendors, and Apple Computer

The District Court held that Microsoft engages in exclusionary conduct in its dealings with ICPs, which develop websites; ISVs, which develop software; and Apple, which is both an OEM and a software developer. See Conclusions of Law, at 42-43 (deals with ICPs, ISVs, and Apple "supplemented Microsoft's efforts in the OEM and IAP channels"). The District Court condemned Microsoft's deals with ICPs and ISVs, stating: "By granting ICPs and ISVs free licenses to bundle [IE] with their offerings, and by exchanging other valuable inducements for their agreement to distribute, promote[,] and rely on [IE] rather than Navigator, Microsoft directly induced developers to focus on its own APIs rather than ones exposed by Navigator." Id. (citing Findings of Fact ¶ ¶ 334-35, 340).

With respect to the deals with ICPs, the District Court's findings do not support liability. After reviewing the ICP agreements, the District Court specifically stated that "there is not sufficient evidence to support a finding that Microsoft's promotional restrictions actually had a substantial, deleterious impact on Navigator's usage share." Findings of Fact ¶ 332. Because plaintiffs failed to demonstrate that Microsoft's deals with the ICPs have a substantial effect upon competition, they have not proved the violation of the Sherman Act.

As for Microsoft's ISV agreements, however, the District Court did not enter a similar finding of no substantial effect. The District Court described Microsoft's deals with ISVs as follows:

> In dozens of "First Wave" agreements signed between the fall of 1997 and the spring of 1998, Microsoft has promised to give preferential support, in the form of early Windows 98 and Windows NT betas, other technical information, and the right to use certain Microsoft > seals of approval, to important ISVs that agree to certain conditions. One of these conditions is that the ISVs use Internet Explorer as the default browsing software for any software they develop with a hypertext-based user interface. Another condition is that the ISVs use Microsoft's "HTML Help," which is accessible only with Internet Explorer, to implement their applications' help systems.

Id. ¶ 339. The District Court further found that the effect of these deals is to "ensure [ ] that many of the most popular Web-centric applications will rely on browsing technologies found only in Windows," id. ¶ 340, and that Microsoft's deals with ISVs therefore "increase[ ] the likelihood that the millions of consumers using [applications designed by ISVs that entered into agreements with Microsoft] will use Internet Explorer rather than Navigator." Id. ¶ 340.

The District Court did not specifically identify what share of the market for browser distribution the exclusive deals with the ISVs foreclose. Although the ISVs are a relatively small channel for browser distribution, they take on greater significance because, as discussed above, Microsoft had largely foreclosed the two primary channels to its rivals. In that light, one can tell from the record that by affecting the applications used by "millions" of consumers, Microsoft's exclusive deals with the ISVs had a substantial effect in further foreclosing rival browsers from the market. (Data introduced by Microsoft, see Direct Testimony of Cameron Myhrvold ¶ 84, reprinted in 6 J.A. at 3922-23, and subsequently relied upon by the District Court in its findings, see, e.g., Findings of Fact ¶ 270, indicate that over the two-year period 1997-98, when Microsoft entered into the First Wave agreements, there were 40 million new users of the internet.) Because, by keeping rival browsers from gaining widespread distribution (and potentially attracting the attention of developers away from the APIs in Windows), the deals have a substantial effect in preserving Microsoft's monopoly, we hold that plaintiffs have made a prima facie showing that the deals have an anticompetitive effect.

Of course, that Microsoft's exclusive deals have the anti-competitive effect of preserving Microsoft's monopoly does not, in itself, make them unlawful. A monopolist, like a competitive firm, may have a perfectly legitimate reason for wanting an exclusive arrangement with its distributors. Accordingly, Microsoft had an opportunity to, but did not, present the District Court with evidence demonstrating that the exclusivity provisions have some such procompetitive justification. See Conclusions of Law, at 43 (citing Findings of Fact ¶ ¶ 339-40) ("With respect to the ISV agreements, Microsoft has put forward no procompetitive business ends whatsoever to justify their exclusionary terms."). On appeal Microsoft likewise does not claim that the exclusivity required by the deals serves any legitimate purpose; instead, it states only that its ISV agreements reflect an attempt "to persuade ISVs to utilize Internet-related system services in Windows rather than Navigator." Appellant's Opening Br. at 114. As we explained before, however, keeping developers focused upon Windows—that is, preserving the Windows monopoly—is a competitively neutral goal. Microsoft having offered no procompetitive justification for its exclusive dealing arrangements with the ISVs, we hold that those arrangements violate § 2 of the Sherman Act.

Finally, the District Court held that Microsoft's dealings with Apple violated the Sherman Act. See Conclusions of Law, at 42-43. Apple is vertically integrated: it makes both software (including an operating system, Mac OS), and hardware (the Macintosh line of computers). Microsoft primarily makes software, including, in addition to its operating system, a number of popular applications. One, called "Office," is a suite of business productivity applications that Microsoft has ported to Mac OS. The District Court found that "ninety percent of Mac OS users running a suite of office productivity applications [use] Microsoft's Mac Office." Findings of Fact ¶ 344. Further, the District Court found that:

> In 1997, Apple's business was in steep decline, and many doubted that the company would survive much long> er.... [M]any ISVs questioned the wisdom of continuing to spend time and money developing applications for the Mac OS. Had Microsoft announced in the midst of this atmosphere that it was ceasing to develop new versions of Mac Office, a great number of ISVs, customers, developers, and investors would have interpreted the announcement as Apple's death notice.

Id. ¶ 344. Microsoft recognized the importance to Apple of its continued support of Mac Office. See id. ¶ 347 (quoting internal Microsoft e-mail) ("[We] need a way to push these guys[, i.e., Apple] and [threatening to cancel Mac Office] is the only one that seems to make them move."); see also id. ("[Microsoft Chairman Bill] Gates asked whether Microsoft could conceal from Apple in the coming month the fact that Microsoft was almost finished developing Mac Office 97."); id. at ¶ 354 ("I think ... Apple should be using [IE] everywhere and if they don't do it, then we can use Office as a club.").

In June 1997 Microsoft Chairman Bill Gates determined that the company's negotiations with Apple " 'have not been going well at all.... Apple let us down on the browser by making Netscape the standard install.' Gates then reported that he had already called Apple's CEO ... to ask 'how we should announce the cancellation of Mac Office....' " Id. at ¶ 349. The District Court further found that, within a month of Gates' call, Apple and Microsoft had reached an agreement pursuant to which > Microsoft's primary obligation is to continue releasing up-to-date versions of Mac Office for at least five years.... [and] Apple has agreed ... to "bundle the most current version of [IE] ... with [Mac OS]"... [and to] "make [IE] the default [browser]".... Navigator is not installed on the computer hard drive during the default installation, which is the type of installation most users elect to employ.... [The] Agreement further provides that ... Apple may not position icons for non-Microsoft browsing software on the desktop of new Macintosh PC systems or Mac OS upgrades.

Id. ¶ ¶ 350-52. The agreement also prohibits Apple from encouraging users to substitute another browser for IE, and states that Apple will "encourage its employees to use [IE]." Id. ¶ 352.

This exclusive deal between Microsoft and Apple has a substantial effect upon the distribution of rival browsers. If a browser developer ports its product to a second operating system, such as the Mac OS, it can continue to display a common set of APIs. Thus, usage share, not the underlying operating system, is the primary determinant of the platform challenge a browser may pose. Pre-installation of a browser (which can be accomplished either by including the browser with the operating system or by the OEM installing the browser) is one of the two most important methods of browser distribution, and Apple had a not insignificant share of worldwide sales of operating systems. See id. ¶ 35 (Microsoft has 95% of the market not counting Apple and "well above" 80% with Apple included in the relevant market). Because Microsoft's exclusive contract with Apple has a substantial effect in restricting distribution of rival browsers, and because (as we have described several times above) reducing usage share of rival browsers serves to protect Microsoft's monopoly, its deal with Apple must be regarded as anticompetitive. See Conclusions of Law, at 42 (citing Findings of Fact ¶ 356) ("By extracting from Apple terms that significantly diminished the usage of Navigator on the Mac OS, Microsoft helped to ensure that developers would not view Navigator as truly cross-platform middleware.").

Microsoft offers no procompetitive justification for the exclusive dealing arrangement. It makes only the irrelevant claim that the IE-for-Mac Office deal is part of a multifaceted set of agreements between itself and Apple, see Appellant's Opening Br. at 61 ("Apple's 'browsing software' obligation was [not] the quid pro quo for Microsoft's Mac Office obligation[;] ... all of the various obligations ... were part of one 'overall agreement' between the two companies."); that does not mean it has any procompetitive justification. Accordingly, we hold that the exclusive deal with Apple is exclusionary, in violation of § 2 of the Sherman Act.

5. Java

Java, a set of technologies developed by Sun Microsystems, is another type of middleware posing a potential threat to Windows' position as the ubiquitous platform for software development. Findings of Fact ¶ 28. The Java technologies include: (1) a programming language; (2) a set of programs written in that language, called the "Java class libraries," which expose APIs; (3) a compiler, which translates code written by a developer into "bytecode"; and (4) a Java Virtual Machine ("JVM"), which translates bytecode into instructions to the operating system. Id. ¶ 73. Programs calling upon the Java APIs will run on any machine with a "Java runtime environment," that is, Java class libraries and a JVM. Id. ¶ ¶ 73, 74.

In May 1995 Netscape agreed with Sun to distribute a copy of the Java runtime environment with every copy of Navigator, and "Navigator quickly became the principal vehicle by which Sun placed copies of its Java runtime environment on the PC systems of Windows users." Id. ¶ 76. Microsoft, too, agreed to promote the Java technologies—or so it seemed. For at the same time, Microsoft took steps "to maximize the difficulty with which applications written in Java could be ported from Windows to other platforms, and vice versa." Conclusions of Law, at 43. Specifically, the District Court found that Microsoft took four steps to exclude Java from developing as a viable cross-platform threat: (a) designing a JVM incompatible with the one developed by Sun; (b) entering into contracts, the so-called "First Wave Agreements," requiring major ISVs to promote Microsoft's JVM exclusively; (c) deceiving Java developers about the Windows-specific nature of the tools it distributed to them; and (d) coercing Intel to stop aiding Sun in improving the Java technologies.

a. The incompatible JVM

The District Court held that Microsoft engaged in exclusionary conduct by developing and promoting its own JVM. Conclusions of Law, at 43-44. Sun had already developed a JVM for the Windows operating system when Microsoft began work on its version. The JVM developed by Microsoft allows Java applications to run faster on Windows than does Sun's JVM, Findings of Fact ¶ 389, but a Java application designed to work with Microsoft's JVM does not work with Sun's JVM and vice versa. Id. ¶ 390. The District Court found that Microsoft "made a large investment of engineering resources to develop a high-performance Windows JVM," id. ¶ 396, and, "[b]y bundling its ... JVM with every copy of [IE] ... Microsoft endowed its Java runtime environment with the unique attribute of guaranteed, enduring ubiquity across the enormous Windows installed base," id. ¶ 397. As explained above, however, a monopolist does not violate the antitrust laws simply by developing a product that is incompatible with those of its rivals. See supra Section II.B.1. In order to violate the antitrust laws, the incompatible product must have an anticompetitive effect that outweighs any procompetitive justification for the design. Microsoft's JVM is not only incompatible with Sun's, it allows Java applications to run faster on Windows than does Sun's JVM. Microsoft's faster JVM lured Java developers into using Microsoft's developer tools, and Microsoft offered those tools deceptively, as we discuss below. The JVM, however, does allow applications to run more swiftly and does not itself have any anticompetitive effect. Therefore, we reverse the District Court's imposition of liability for Microsoft's development and promotion of its JVM.

b. The First Wave Agreements

The District Court also found that Microsoft entered into First Wave Agreements with dozens of ISVs to use Microsoft's JVM. See Findings of Fact ¶ 401 ("[I]n exchange for costly technical support and other blandishments, Microsoft induced dozens of important ISVs to make their Java applications reliant on Windows-specific technologies and to refrain from distributing to Windows users JVMs that complied with Sun's standards."). Again, we reject the District Court's condemnation of low but non-predatory pricing by Microsoft.

To the extent Microsoft's First Wave Agreements with the ISVs conditioned receipt of Windows technical information upon the ISVs' agreement to promote Microsoft's JVM exclusively, they raise a different competitive concern. The District Court found that, although not literally exclusive, the deals were exclusive in practice because they required developers to make Microsoft's JVM the default in the software they developed. Id. ¶ 401.

While the District Court did not enter precise findings as to the effect of the First Wave Agreements upon the overall distribution of rival JVMs, the record indicates that Microsoft's deals with the major ISVs had a significant effect upon JVM promotion. As discussed above, the products of First Wave ISVs reached millions of consumers. Id. ¶ 340. The First Wave ISVs included such prominent developers as Rational Software, see GX 970, reprinted in 15 J.A. at 9994-10000, "a world leader" in software development tools, see Direct Testimony of Michael Devlin ¶ 2, reprinted in 5 J.A. at 3520, and Symantec, see GX 2071, reprinted in 22 J.A. at 14960-66 (sealed), which, according to Microsoft itself, is "the leading supplier of utilities such as anti-virus software," Defendant's Proposed Findings of Fact ¶ 276, reprinted in 3 J.A. at 1689. Moreover, Microsoft's exclusive deals with the leading ISVs took place against a backdrop of foreclosure: the District Court found that "[w]hen Netscape announced in May 1995 [prior to Microsoft's execution of the First Wave Agreements] that it would include with every copy of Navigator a copy of a Windows JVM that complied with Sun's standards, it appeared that Sun's Java implementation would achieve the necessary ubiquity on Windows." Findings of Fact ¶ 394. As discussed above, however, Microsoft undertook a number of anticompetitive actions that seriously reduced the distribution of Navigator, and the District Court found that those actions thereby seriously impeded distribution of Sun's JVM. Conclusions of Law, at 43-44. Because Microsoft's agreements foreclosed a substantial portion of the field for JVM distribution and because, in so doing, they protected Microsoft's monopoly from a middleware threat, they are anticompetitive.

Microsoft offered no procompetitive justification for the default clause that made the First Wave Agreements exclusive as a practical matter. See Findings of Fact ¶ 401.

Because the cumulative effect of the deals is anticompetitive and because Microsoft has no procompetitive justification for them, we hold that the provisions in the First Wave Agreements requiring use of Microsoft's JVM as the default are exclusionary, in violation of the Sherman Act.

c. Deception of Java developers

Microsoft's "Java implementation" included, in addition to a JVM, a set of software development tools it created to assist ISVs in designing Java applications. The District Court found that, not only were these tools incompatible with Sun's cross-platform aspirations for Java—no violation, to be sure—but Microsoft deceived Java developers regarding the Windows-specific nature of the tools. Microsoft's tools included "certain 'keywords' and 'compiler directives' that could only be executed properly by Microsoft's version of the Java runtime environment for Windows." Id. ¶ 394; see also Direct Testimony of James Gosling ¶ 58, reprinted in 21 J.A. at 13959 (Microsoft added "programming instructions ... that alter the behavior of the code."). As a result, even Java "developers who were opting for portability over performance ... unwittingly [wrote] Java applications that [ran] only on Windows." Conclusions of Law, at 43. That is, developers who relied upon Microsoft's public commitment to cooperate with Sun and who used Microsoft's tools to develop what Microsoft led them to believe were cross-platform applications ended up producing applications that would run only on the Windows operating system.

When specifically accused by a PC Week reporter of fragmenting Java standards so as to prevent cross-platform uses, Microsoft denied the accusation and indicated it was only "adding rich platform support" to what remained a cross-platform implementation. An e-mail message internal to Microsoft, written shortly after the conversation with the reporter, shows otherwise:

> [O]k, i just did a followup call.... [The reporter] liked that i kept pointing customers to w3c standards [(commonly observed internet protocols)].... [but] he accused us of being schizo with this vs. our java approach, i said > he misunderstood [—] that [with Java] we are merely trying to add rich platform support to an interop layer.... this plays well.... at this point its [sic] not good to create MORE noise around our win32 java classes. instead we should just quietly grow j [(Microsoft's development tools)] share and assume that people will take more advantage of our classes without ever realizing they are building win32-only java apps.

GX 1332, reprinted in 22 J.A. at 14922-23.

Finally, other Microsoft documents confirm that Microsoft intended to deceive Java developers, and predicted that the effect of its actions would be to generate Windows-dependent Java applications that their developers believed would be cross-platform; these documents also indicate that Microsoft's ultimate objective was to thwart Java's threat to Microsoft's monopoly in the market for operating systems. One Microsoft document, for example, states as a strategic goal: "Kill cross-platform Java by grow[ing] the polluted Java market." GX 259, reprinted in 22 J.A. at 14514; see also id. ("Cross-platform capability is by far the number one reason for choosing/using Java.") (emphasis in original).

Microsoft's conduct related to its Java developer tools served to protect its monopoly of the operating system in a manner not attributable either to the superiority of the operating system or to the acumen of its makers, and therefore was anticompetitive. Unsurprisingly, Microsoft offers no procompetitive explanation for its campaign to deceive developers. Accordingly, we conclude this conduct is exclusionary, in violation of § 2 of the Sherman Act.

d. The threat to Intel

The District Court held that Microsoft also acted unlawfully with respect to Java by using its "monopoly power to prevent firms such as Intel from aiding in the creation of cross-platform interfaces." Conclusions of Law, at 43. In 1995 Intel was in the process of developing a high-performance, Windows-compatible JVM. Microsoft wanted Intel to abandon that effort because a fast, cross-platform

JVM would threaten Microsoft's monopoly in the operating system market. At an August 1995 meeting, Microsoft's Gates told Intel that its "cooperation with Sun and Netscape to develop a Java runtime environment ... was one of the issues threatening to undermine cooperation between Intel and Microsoft." Findings of Fact ¶ 396. Three months later, "Microsoft's Paul Maritz told a senior Intel executive that Intel's [adaptation of its multimedia software to comply with] Sun's Java standards was as inimical to Microsoft as Microsoft's support for non-Intel microprocessors would be to Intel." Id. ¶ 405.

Intel nonetheless continued to undertake initiatives related to Java. By 1996 "Intel had developed a JVM designed to run well ... while complying with Sun's cross-platform standards." Id. ¶ 396. In April of that year, Microsoft again urged Intel not to help Sun by distributing Intel's fast, Sun-compliant JVM. Id. And Microsoft threatened Intel that if it did not stop aiding Sun on the multimedia front, then Microsoft would refuse to distribute Intel technologies bundled with Windows. Id. ¶ 404.

Intel finally capitulated in 1997, after Microsoft delivered the coup de grace.

> [O]ne of Intel's competitors, called AMD, solicited support from Microsoft for its "3DX" technology.... Microsoft's Allchin asked Gates whether Microsoft should support 3DX, despite the fact that Intel would oppose it. Gates responded: "If Intel has a real problem with us supporting this then they will have to stop supporting Java Multimedia the way they are. I would gladly give up supporting this if they would back off from their work on JAVA."

Id. ¶ 406.

Microsoft's internal documents and deposition testimony confirm both the anticompetitive effect and intent of its actions. See, e.g., GX 235, reprinted in 22 J.A. at 14502 (Microsoft executive, Eric Engstrom, included among Microsoft's goals for Intel: "Intel to stop helping Sun create Java Multimedia APIs, especially ones that run well ... on Windows."); Deposition of Eric Engstrom at 179 ("We were successful [in convincing Intel to stop aiding Sun] for some period of time.").

Microsoft does not deny the facts found by the District Court, nor does it offer any procompetitive justification for pressuring Intel not to support cross-platform Java. Microsoft lamely characterizes its threat to Intel as "advice." The District Court, however, found that Microsoft's "advice" to Intel to stop aiding cross-platform Java was backed by the threat of retaliation, and this conclusion is supported by the evidence cited above. Therefore we affirm the conclusion that Microsoft's threats to Intel were exclusionary, in violation of § 2 of the Sherman Act.

6. Course of Conduct

The District Court held that, apart from Microsoft's specific acts, Microsoft was liable under § 2 based upon its general "course of conduct." In reaching this conclusion the court relied upon Continental Ore Co. v. Union Carbide & Carbon Corp., 370 U.S. 690, 699 (1962), where the Supreme Court stated, "[i]n [Sherman Act cases], plaintiffs should be given the full benefit of their proof without tightly compartmentalizing the various factual components and wiping the slate clean after scrutiny of each."

Microsoft points out that Continental Ore and the other cases cited by plaintiffs in support of "course of conduct" liability all involve conspiracies among multiple firms, not the conduct of a single firm; in that setting the "course of conduct" is the conspiracy itself, for which all the participants may be held liable. See Appellant's Opening Br. at 112-13. Plaintiffs respond that, as a policy matter, a monopolist's unilateral "campaign of [acts intended to exclude a rival] that in the aggregate has the requisite impact" warrants liability even if the acts viewed individually would be lawful for want of a significant effect upon competition. Appellees' Br. at 82-83.

We need not pass upon plaintiffs' argument, however, because the District Court did not point to any series of acts, each of which harms competition only slightly but the cumulative effect of which is significant enough to form an independent basis for liability. The "course of conduct" section of the District Court's opinion contains, with one exception, only broad, summarizing conclusions. See, e.g., Conclusions of Law, at 44 ("Microsoft placed an oppressive thumb on the scale of competitive fortune...."). The only specific acts to which the court refers are Microsoft's expenditures in promoting its browser, see id. ("Microsoft has expended wealth and foresworn opportunities to realize more...."), which we have explained are not in themselves unlawful. Because the District Court identifies no other specific acts as a basis for "course of conduct" liability, we reverse its conclusion that Microsoft's course of conduct separately violates § 2 of the Sherman Act.

C. Causation

As a final parry, Microsoft urges this court to reverse on the monopoly maintenance claim, because plaintiffs never established a causal link between Microsoft's anticompetitive conduct, in particular its foreclosure of Netscape's and Java's distribution channels, and the maintenance of Microsoft's operating system monopoly. See Findings of Fact ¶ 411 ("There is insufficient evidence to find that, absent Microsoft's actions, Navigator and Java already would have ignited genuine competition in the market for Intel-compatible PC operating systems."). This is the flip side of Microsoft's earlier argument that the District Court should have included middleware in the relevant market. According to Microsoft, the District Court cannot simultaneously find that middleware is not a reasonable substitute and that Microsoft's exclusionary conduct contributed to the maintenance of monopoly power in the operating system market. Microsoft claims that the first finding depended on the court's view that middleware does not pose a serious threat to Windows, see supra Section II.A, while the second finding required the court to find that Navigator and Java would have developed into serious enough cross-platform threats to erode the applications barrier to entry. We disagree.

Microsoft points to no case, and we can find none, standing for the proposition that, as to § 2 liability in an equitable enforcement action, plaintiffs must present direct proof that a defendant's continued monopoly power is precisely attributable to its anticompetitive conduct. As its lone authority, Microsoft cites the following passage from Professor Areeda's antitrust treatise: "The plaintiff has the burden of pleading, introducing evidence, and presumably proving by a preponderance of the evidence that reprehensible behavior has contributed significantly to the ... maintenance of the monopoly." 3 PHILLIP E. AREEDA & HERBERT HOVENKAMP, ANTITRUST LAW ¶ 650c, at 69 (1996) (emphasis added).

But, with respect to actions seeking injunctive relief, the authors of that treatise also recognize the need for courts to infer "causation" from the fact that a defendant has engaged in anticompetitive conduct that "reasonably appear[s] capable of making a significant contribution to ... maintaining monopoly power." Id. ¶ 651c, at 78; see also Morgan v. Ponder, 892 F.2d 1355, 1363 (8th Cir. 1989); Barry Wright, 724 F.2d at 230. To require that § 2 liability turn on a plaintiff's ability or inability to reconstruct the hypothetical marketplace absent a defendant's anticompetitive conduct would only encourage monopolists to take more and earlier anticompetitive action.

We may infer causation when exclusionary conduct is aimed at producers of nascent competitive technologies as well as when it is aimed at producers of established substitutes. Admittedly, in the former case there is added uncertainty, inasmuch as nascent threats are merely potential substitutes. But the underlying proof problem is the same—neither plaintiffs nor the court can confidently reconstruct a product's hypothetical technological development in a world absent the defendant's exclusionary conduct. To some degree, "the defendant is made to suffer the uncertain consequences of its own undesirable conduct." 3 AREEDA & HOVENKAMP, ANTITRUST LAW ¶ 651c, at 78.

Given this rather edentulous test for causation, the question in this case is not whether Java or Navigator would actually have developed into viable platform substitutes, but (1) whether as a general matter the exclusion of nascent threats is the type of conduct that is reasonably capable of contributing significantly to a defendant's continued monopoly power and (2) whether Java and Navigator reasonably constituted nascent threats at the time Microsoft engaged in the anticompetitive conduct at issue. As to the first, suffice it to say that it would be inimical to the purpose of the Sherman Act to allow monopolists free reign to squash nascent, albeit unproven, competitors at will—particularly in industries marked by rapid technological advance and frequent paradigm shifts. Findings of Fact ¶ ¶ 59-60. As to the second, the District Court made ample findings that both Navigator and Java showed potential as middleware platform threats. Findings of Fact ¶ ¶ 68-77. Counsel for Microsoft admitted as much at oral argument. 02/26/01 Ct. Appeals Tr. at 27 ("There are no constraints on output. Marginal costs are essentially zero. And there are to some extent network effects. So a company like Netscape founded in 1994 can be by the middle of 1995 clearly a potentially lethal competitor to Windows because it can supplant its position in the market because of the characteristics of these markets.").

Microsoft's concerns over causation have more purchase in connection with the appropriate remedy issue, i.e., whether the court should impose a structural remedy or merely enjoin the offensive conduct at issue. As we point out later in this opinion, divestiture is a remedy that is imposed only with great caution, in part because its long-term efficacy is rarely certain. See infra Section V.E. Absent some measure of confidence that there has been an actual loss to competition that needs to be restored, wisdom counsels against adopting radical structural relief. See 3 AREEDA & HOVENKAMP, ANTITRUST LAW ¶ 653b, at 91-92 ("[M]ore extensive equitable relief, particularly remedies such as divestiture designed to eliminate the monopoly altogether, raise more serious questions and require a clearer indication of a significant causal connection between the conduct and creation or maintenance of the market power."). But these queries go to questions of remedy, not liability. In short, causation affords Microsoft no defense to liability for its unlawful actions undertaken to maintain its monopoly in the operating system market.

III. Attempted Monopolization

Microsoft further challenges the District Court's determination of liability for "attempt[ing] to monopolize ... any part of the trade or commerce among the several States." 15 U.S.C. § 2 (1997). To establish a § 2 violation for attempted monopolization, "a plaintiff must prove (1) that the defendant has engaged in predatory or anticompetitive conduct with (2) a specific intent to monopolize and (3) a dangerous probability of achieving monopoly power." Spectrum Sports, Inc. v. McQuillan, 506 U.S. 447, 456 (1993); see also Times-Picayune Pub. Co. v. United States, 345 U.S. 594, 626 (1953); Lorain Journal Co. v. United States, 342 U.S. 143, 153-55 (1951). Because a deficiency on any one of the three will defeat plaintiffs' claim, we look no further than plaintiffs' failure to prove a dangerous probability of achieving monopoly power in the putative browser market.

The determination whether a dangerous probability of success exists is a particularly fact-intensive inquiry. Because the Sherman Act does not identify the activities that constitute the offense of attempted monopolization, the court "must examine the facts of each case, mindful that the determination of what constitutes an attempt, as Justice Holmes explained, 'is a question of proximity and degree.' " United States v. Am. Airlines, Inc., 743 F.2d 1114, 1118 (5th Cir. 1984) (quoting Swift & Co. v. United States, 196 U.S. 375, 402 (1904)). The District Court determined that "[t]he evidence supports the conclusion that Microsoft's actions did pose such a danger." Conclusions of Law, at 45. Specifically, the District Court concluded that "Netscape's assent to Microsoft's market division proposal would have, instanter, resulted in Microsoft's attainment of monopoly power in a second market," and that "the proposal itself created a dangerous probability of that result." Conclusions of Law, at 46 (citation omitted). The District Court further concluded that "the predatory course of conduct Microsoft has pursued since June of 1995 has revived the dangerous probability that Microsoft will attain monopoly power in a second market." Id.

At the outset we note a pervasive flaw in the District Court's and plaintiffs' discussion of attempted monopolization. Simply put, plaintiffs have made the same argument under two different headings—monopoly maintenance and attempted monopolization. They have relied upon Microsoft's § 2 liability for monopolization of the operating system market as a presumptive indicator of attempted monopolization of an entirely different market. The District Court implicitly accepted this approach: It agreed with plaintiffs that the events that formed the basis for the § 2 monopolization claim "warrant[ed] additional liability as an illegal attempt to amass monopoly power in 'the browser market.' " Id. at 45 (emphasis added). Thus, plaintiffs and the District Court failed to recognize the need for an analysis wholly independent of the conclusions and findings on monopoly maintenance.

To establish a dangerous probability of success, plaintiffs must as a threshold matter show that the browser market can be monopolized, i.e., that a hypothetical monopolist in that market could enjoy market power. This, in turn, requires plaintiffs (1) to define the relevant market and (2) to demonstrate that substantial barriers to entry protect that market. Because plaintiffs have not carried their burden on either prong, we reverse without remand.

A. Relevant Market

A court's evaluation of an attempted monopolization claim must include a definition of the relevant market. See Spectrum Sports, 506 U.S. at 455-56. Such a definition establishes a context for evaluating the defendant's actions as well as for measuring whether the challenged conduct presented a dangerous probability of monopolization. See id. The District Court omitted this element of the Spectrum Sports inquiry.

Defining a market for an attempted monopolization claim involves the same steps as defining a market for a monopoly maintenance claim, namely a detailed description of the purpose of a browser—what functions may be included and what are not—and an examination of the substitutes that are part of the market and those that are not. See also supra Section II.A. The District Court never engaged in such an analysis nor entered detailed findings defining what a browser is or what products might constitute substitutes. In the Findings of Fact, the District Court (in a section on whether IE and Windows are separate products) stated only that "a Web browser provides the ability for the end user to select, retrieve, and perceive resources on the Web." Findings of Fact ¶ 150. Furthermore, in discussing attempted monopolization in its Conclusions of Law, the District Court failed to demonstrate analytical rigor when it employed varying and imprecise references to the "market for browsing technology for Windows," "the browser market," and "platform-level browsing software." Conclusions of Law, at 45.

Because the determination of a relevant market is a factual question to be resolved by the District Court, see, e.g., All Care Nursing Serv., Inc. v. High Tech Staffing Servs., Inc., 135 F.3d 740, 749 (11th Cir. 1998); Tunis Bros. Co., Inc. v. Ford Motor Co., 952 F.2d 715, 722-23 (3d Cir. 1991); Westman Comm'n Co. v. Hobart Int'l, Inc., 796 F.2d 1216, 1220 (10th Cir. 1986), we would normally remand the case so that the District Court could formulate an appropriate definition. See Pullman-Standard v. Swint, 456 U.S. 273, 291-92 & n.22 (1982); Janini v. Kuwait Univ., 43 F.3d 1534, 1537 (D.C. Cir. 1995); Palmer v. Shultz, 815 F.2d 84, 103 (D.C. Cir. 1987). A remand on market definition is unnecessary, however, because the District Court's imprecision is directly traceable to plaintiffs' failure to articulate and identify evidence before the District Court as to (1) what constitutes a browser (i.e., what are the technological components of or functionalities provided by a browser) and (2) why certain other products are not reasonable substitutes (e.g., browser shells or viewers for individual internet extensions, such as Real Audio Player or Adobe Acrobat Reader). See Plaintiffs' Joint Proposed Findings of Fact, at 817-19, reprinted in 2 J.A. at 1480-82; Plaintiffs' Joint Proposed Conclusions of Law § IV (No. 98-1232); see also Lee v. Interstate Fire & Cas. Co., 86 F.3d 101, 105 (7th Cir. 1996) (stating that remand for development of a factual record is inappropriate where plaintiff failed to meet burden of persuasion and never suggested that additional evidence was necessary). Indeed, when plaintiffs in their Proposed Findings of Fact attempted to define a relevant market for the attempt claim, they pointed only to their separate products analysis for the tying claim. See, e.g., Plaintiffs' Joint Proposed Findings of Fact, at 818, reprinted in 2 J.A. at 1481. However, the separate products analysis for tying purposes is not a substitute for the type of market definition that Spectrum Sports requires. See infra Section IV.A.

Plaintiffs' proposed findings and the District Court's actual findings on attempted monopolization pale in comparison to their counterparts on the monopoly maintenance claim. Compare Findings of Fact ¶ 150, and Plaintiffs' Joint Proposed Findings of Fact, at 817-819, reprinted in 2 J.A. at 1480-82, with Findings of Fact ¶ ¶ 18-66, and Plaintiffs' Joint Proposed Findings of Fact, at 20-31, reprinted in 1 J.A. at 658-69. Furthermore, in their brief and at oral argument before this court, plaintiffs did nothing to clarify or ameliorate this deficiency. See, e.g., Appellees' Br. at 93-94.`

B. Barriers to Entry

Because a firm cannot possess monopoly power in a market unless that market is also protected by significant barriers to entry, see supra Section II.A, it follows that a firm cannot threaten to achieve monopoly power in a market unless that market is, or will be, similarly protected. See Spectrum Sports, 506 U.S. at 456 ("In order to determine whether there is a dangerous probability of monopolization, courts have found it necessary to consider ... the defendant's ability to lessen or destroy competition in that market.") (citing cases). Plaintiffs have the burden of establishing barriers to entry into a properly defined relevant market. See 2A PHILLIP E. AREEDA ET AL., ANTITRUST LAW ¶ 420b, at 57-59 (1995); 3A PHILLIP E. AREEDA & HERBERT HOVENKAMP, ANTITRUST LAW ¶ 807g, at 361-62 (1996); see also Neumann v. Reinforced

Earth Co., 786 F.2d 424, 429 (D.C. Cir. 1986). Plaintiffs must not only show that barriers to entry protect the properly defined browser market, but that those barriers are "significant." See United States v. Baker Hughes Inc., 908 F.2d 981, 987 (D.C. Cir. 1990). Whether there are significant barriers to entry cannot, of course, be answered absent an appropriate market definition; thus, plaintiffs' failure on that score alone is dispositive. But even were we to assume a properly defined market, for example browsers consisting of a graphical interface plus internet protocols, plaintiffs nonetheless failed to carry their burden on barriers to entry.

Contrary to plaintiffs' contention on appeal, see Appellees' Br. at 91-93, none of the District Court's statements constitutes a finding of barriers to entry into the web browser market. Finding of Fact 89 states:

> At the time Microsoft presented its proposal, Navigator was the only browser product with a significant share of the market and thus the only one with the potential to weaken the applications barrier to entry. Thus, had it convinced Netscape to accept its offer of a "special relationship," Microsoft quickly would have gained such control over the extensions and standards that network-centric applications (including Web sites) employ as to make it all but impossible for any future browser rival to lure appreciable developer interest away from Microsoft's platform.

This finding is far too speculative to establish that competing browsers would be unable to enter the market, or that Microsoft would have the power to raise the price of its browser above, or reduce the quality of its browser below, the competitive level. Moreover, it is ambiguous insofar as it appears to focus on Microsoft's response to the perceived platform threat rather than the browser market. Finding of Fact 144, on which plaintiffs also rely, is part of the District Court's discussion of Microsoft's alleged anticompetitive actions to eliminate the platform threat posed by Netscape Navigator. This finding simply describes Microsoft's reliance on studies indicating consumers' reluctance to switch browsers, a reluctance not shown to be any more than that which stops consumers from switching brands of cereal. Absent more extensive and definitive factual findings, the District Court's legal conclusions about entry barriers amount to nothing more than speculation.

In contrast to their minimal effort on market definition, plaintiffs did at least offer proposed findings of fact suggesting that the possibility of network effects could potentially create barriers to entry into the browser market. See Plaintiffs' Joint Proposed Findings of Fact, at 822-23, 825-27, reprinted in 2 J.A. at 1485-86, 1488-90. The District Court did not adopt those proposed findings. See Findings of Fact ¶ 89. However, the District Court did acknowledge the possibility of a different kind of entry barrier in its Conclusions of Law:

> In the time it would have taken an aspiring entrant to launch a serious effort to compete against Internet Explorer, Microsoft could have erected the same type of barrier that protects its existing monopoly power by adding proprietary extensions to the browsing software under its control and by extracting commitments from OEMs, IAPs and others similar to the ones discussed in [the monopoly maintenance section].

Conclusions of Law, at 46 (emphasis added).

Giving plaintiffs and the District Court the benefit of the doubt, we might remand if the possible existence of entry barriers resulting from the possible creation and exploitation of network effects in the browser market were the only concern. That is not enough to carry the day, however, because the District Court did not make two key findings: (1) that network effects were a necessary or even probable, rather than merely possible, consequence of high market share in the browser market and (2) that a barrier to entry resulting from network effects would be "significant" enough to confer monopoly power. Again, these deficiencies are in large part traceable to plaintiffs' own failings. As to the first point, the District Court's use of the phrase "could have"

reflects the same uncertainty articulated in testimony cited in plaintiffs' proposed findings. See Plaintiffs' Joint Proposed Findings of Fact, at 822 (citing testimony of Frederick Warren-Boulton), at 826 (citing testimony of Franklin Fisher), reprinted in 2 J.A. at 1485, 1489. As to the second point, the cited testimony in plaintiffs' proposed findings offers little more than conclusory statements. See id. at 822-27, reprinted in 2 J.A. at 1485-90. The proffered testimony contains no evidence regarding the cost of "porting" websites to different browsers or the potentially different economic incentives facing ICPs, as opposed to ISVs, in their decision to incur costs to do so. Simply invoking the phrase "network effects" without pointing to more evidence does not suffice to carry plaintiffs' burden in this respect.

Any doubt that we may have had regarding remand instead of outright reversal on the barriers to entry question was dispelled by plaintiffs' arguments on attempted monopolization before this court. Not only did plaintiffs fail to articulate a website barrier to entry theory in either their brief or at oral argument, they failed to point the court to evidence in the record that would support a finding that Microsoft would likely erect significant barriers to entry upon acquisition of a dominant market share.

Plaintiffs did not devote the same resources to the attempted monopolization claim as they did to the monopoly maintenance claim. But both claims require evidentiary and theoretical rigor. Because plaintiffs failed to make their case on attempted monopolization both in the District Court and before this court, there is no reason to give them a second chance to flesh out a claim that should have been fleshed out the first time around. Accordingly, we reverse the District Court's determination of § 2 liability for attempted monopolization.

IV. TYING

Microsoft also contests the District Court's determination of liability under § 1 of the Sherman Act. The District Court concluded that Microsoft's contractual and technological bundling of the IE web browser (the "tied" product) with its Windows operating system ("OS") (the "tying" product) resulted in a tying arrangement that was per se unlawful. Conclusions of Law, at 47-51. We hold that the rule of reason, rather than per se analysis, should govern the legality of tying arrangements involving platform software products. The Supreme Court has warned that " '[i]t is only after considerable experience with certain business relationships that courts classify them as per se violations....' " Broad. Music, Inc. v. CBS, 441 U.S. 1, 9 (1979) (quoting United States v. Topco Assocs., 405 U.S. 596, 607-08 (1972)). While every "business relationship" will in some sense have unique features, some represent entire, novel categories of dealings. As we shall explain, the arrangement before us is an example of the latter, offering the first up-close look at the technological integration of added functionality into software that serves as a platform for third-party applications. There being no close parallel in prior antitrust cases, simplistic application of per se tying rules carries a serious risk of harm. Accordingly, we vacate the District Court's finding of a per se tying violation and remand the case. Plaintiffs may on remand pursue their tying claim under the rule of reason.

The facts underlying the tying allegation substantially overlap with those set forth in Section II.B in connection with the § 2 monopoly maintenance claim. The key District Court findings are that (1) Microsoft required licensees of Windows 95 and 98 also to license IE as a bundle at a single price, Findings of Fact ¶ ¶ 137, 155, 158; (2) Microsoft refused to allow OEMs to uninstall or remove IE from the Windows desktop, id. ¶ ¶ 158, 203, 213; (3) Microsoft designed Windows 98 in a way that withheld from consumers the ability to remove IE by use of the Add/Remove Programs utility, id. ¶ 170; cf. id. ¶ 165 (stating that IE was subject to Add/Remove Programs utility in Windows 95); and (4) Microsoft designed Windows 98 to override the user's choice of default web browser in certain circumstances, id. ¶ ¶ 171, 172. The court found that these acts constituted a per se tying violation. Conclusions of Law, at 47-51. Although the District Court also found that Microsoft commingled operating system-only and browser-only routines in the same library files, Findings of Fact ¶ ¶ 161, 164, it did not include this as a basis for tying liability despite plaintiffs' request that it do so, Plaintiffs' Proposed Findings of Fact, ¶ ¶ 131-32, reprinted in 2 J.A. at 941-47.

There are four elements to a per se tying violation: (1) the tying and tied goods are two separate products; (2) the defendant has market power in the tying product market; (3) the defendant affords consumers no choice but to purchase the tied product from it; and (4) the tying arrangement forecloses a substantial volume of commerce. See Eastman Kodak Co. v. Image Tech. Servs., Inc., 504 U.S. 451, 461-62 (1992); Jefferson Parish Hosp. Dist. No. 2 v. Hyde, 466 U.S. 2, 12-18 (1984).

Microsoft does not dispute that it bound Windows and IE in the four ways the District Court cited. Instead it argues that Windows (the tying good) and IE browsers (the tied good) are not "separate products," Appellant's Opening Br. at 69-79, and that it did not substantially foreclose competing browsers from the tied product market, id. at 79-83. (Microsoft also contends that it does not have monopoly power in the tying product market, id. at 84-96, but, for reasons given in Section II.A, we uphold the District Court's finding to the contrary.)

We first address the separate-products inquiry, a source of much argument between the parties and of confusion in the cases. Our purpose is to highlight the poor fit between the separate-products test and the facts of this case. We then offer further reasons for carving an exception to the per se rule when the tying product is platform software. In the final section we discuss the District Court's inquiry if plaintiffs pursue a rule of reason claim on remand.

A. Separate-Products Inquiry Under the Per Se Test

The requirement that a practice involve two separate products before being condemned as an illegal tie started as a purely linguistic requirement: unless products are separate, one cannot be "tied" to the other. Indeed, the nature of the products involved in early tying cases—intuitively distinct items such as a movie projector and a film, Motion Picture Patents Co. v. Universal Film Mfg. Co., 243 U.S. 502 (1917)—led courts either to disregard the separate-products question, see, e.g., United Shoe Mach. Corp. v. United States, 258 U.S. 451 (1922), or to discuss it only in passing, see, e.g., Motion Picture Patents, 243 U.S. at 508, 512, 518. It was not until Times-Picayune Publishing Co. v. United States, 345 U.S. 594 (1953), that the separate-products issue became a distinct element of the test for an illegal tie. Id. at 614. Even that case engaged in a rather cursory inquiry into whether ads sold in the morning edition of a paper were a separate product from ads sold in the evening edition.

The first case to give content to the separate-products test was Jefferson Parish, 466 U.S. 2. That case addressed a tying arrangement in which a hospital conditioned surgical care at its facility on the purchase of anesthesiological services from an affiliated medical group. The facts were a challenge for casual separate-products analysis because the tied service—anesthesia—was neither intuitively distinct from nor intuitively contained within the tying service—surgical care. A further complication was that, soon after the Court enunciated the per se rule for tying liability in International Salt Co. v. United States, 332 U.S. 392, 396 (1947), and Northern Pacific Railway Co. v. United States, 356 U.S. 1, 5-7 (1958), new economic research began to cast doubt on the assumption, voiced by the Court when it established the rule, that " 'tying agreements serve hardly any purpose beyond the suppression of competition,' " id. at 6 (quoting Standard Oil of Cal. v. United States, 337 U.S. 293, 305-06 (1949)); see also Jefferson Parish, 466 U.S. at 15 n.23 (citing materials); Fortner Enters. v. U.S. Steel Corp., 394 U.S. 495, 524-25 (1969) (Fortas, J., dissenting) ("Fortner I").

The Jefferson Parish Court resolved the matter in two steps. First, it clarified that "the answer to the question whether one or two products are involved" does not turn "on the functional relation between them...." Jefferson Parish, 466 U.S. at 19; see also id. at 19 n.30. In other words, the mere fact that two items are complements, that "one ... is useless without the other," id., does not make them a single "product" for purposes of tying law. Accord Eastman Kodak, 504 U.S. at 463. Second, reasoning that the "definitional question [whether two distinguishable products are involved] depends on whether the arrangement may have the type of competitive consequences addressed by the rule [against tying]," Jefferson Parish, 466 U.S. at 21, the Court decreed that "no tying arrangement can exist unless there is a sufficient demand for the purchase of anesthesiological services separate from hospital services to identify a distinct product market in which it is efficient to offer anesthesiological services separately from hospital service," id. at 21-22 (emphasis added); accord Eastman Kodak, 504 U.S. at 462.

The Court proceeded to examine direct and indirect evidence of consumer demand for the tied product separate from the tying product. Direct evidence addresses the question whether, when given a choice, consumers purchase the tied good from the tying good maker, or from other firms. The Court took note, for example, of testimony that patients and surgeons often requested specific anesthesiologists not associated with a hospital. Jefferson Parish, 466 U.S. at 22. Indirect evidence includes the behavior of firms without market power in the tying good market, presumably on the notion that (competitive) supply follows demand. If competitive firms always bundle the tying and tied goods, then they are a single product. See id. at 22 n.36; see also Eastman Kodak, 504 U.S. at 462; Fortner I, 394 U.S. at 525 (Fortas, J., dissenting), cited in Jefferson Parish, 466 U.S. at 12, 22 n.35; United States v. Jerrold Elecs. Corp., 187 F. Supp. 545, 559 (E.D. Pa. 1960), aff'd per curiam, 365 U.S. 567 (1961); 10 PHILLIP E. AREEDA ET AL., ANTITRUST LAW ¶ 1744, at 197-201 (1996). Here the Court noted that only 27% of anesthesiologists in markets other than the defendant's had financial relationships with hospitals, and that, unlike radiologists and pathologists, anesthesiologists were not usually employed by hospitals, i.e., bundled with hospital services. Jefferson Parish, 466 U.S. at 22 n.36. With both direct and indirect evidence concurring, the Court determined that hospital surgery and anesthesiological services were distinct goods.

To understand the logic behind the Court's consumer demand test, consider first the postulated harms from tying. The core concern is that tying prevents goods from competing directly for consumer choice on their merits, i.e., being selected as a result of "buyers' independent judgment," id. at 13 (internal quotes omitted). With a tie, a buyer's "freedom to select the best bargain in the second market [could be] impaired by his need to purchase the tying product, and perhaps by an inability to evaluate the true cost of either product...." Id. at 15. Direct competition on the merits of the tied product is foreclosed when the tying product either is sold only in a bundle with the tied product or, though offered separately, is sold at a bundled price, so that the buyer pays the same price whether he takes the tied product or not. In both cases, a consumer buying the tying product becomes entitled to the tied product; he will therefore likely be unwilling to buy a competitor's version of the tied product even if, making his own price/quality assessment, that is what he would prefer.

But not all ties are bad. Bundling obviously saves distribution and consumer transaction costs. 9 PHILLIP E. AREEDA, ANTITRUST LAW ¶ 1703g2, at 51-52 (1991). This is likely to be true, to take some examples from the computer industry, with the integration of math co-processors and memory into microprocessor chips and the inclusion of spell checkers in word processors. 11/10/98 pm Tr. at 18-19 (trial testimony of Steven McGeady of Intel), reprinted in 9 J.A. at 5581-82 (math co-processor); Cal. Computer Prods., Inc. v. IBM Corp., 613 F.2d 727, 744 & n.29 (9th Cir. 1979) (memory). Bundling can also capitalize on certain economies of scope. A possible example is the "shared" library files that perform OS and browser functions with the very same lines of code and thus may save drive space from the clutter of redundant routines and memory when consumers use both the OS and browser simultaneously. 11/16/98 pm Tr. at 44 (trial testimony of Glenn Weadock), reprinted in 9 J.A. at 5892; Direct Testimony of Microsoft's James Allchin ¶ ¶ 10, 97, 100, 106-

116, app. A (excluding ¶ ¶ f, g.vi), reprinted in 5 J.A. at 3292, 3322-30, 3412-17. Indeed, if there were no efficiencies from a tie (including economizing on consumer transaction costs such as the time and effort involved in choice), we would expect distinct consumer demand for each individual component of every good. In a competitive market with zero transaction costs, the computers on which this opinion was written would only be sold piecemeal—keyboard, monitor, mouse, central processing unit, disk drive, and memory all sold in separate transactions and likely by different manufacturers.

Recognizing the potential benefits from tying, see Jefferson Parish, 466 U.S. at 21 n.33, the Court in Jefferson Parish forged a separate-products test that, like those of market power and substantial foreclosure, attempts to screen out false positives under per se analysis. The consumer demand test is a rough proxy for whether a tying arrangement may, on balance, be welfare-enhancing, and unsuited to per se condemnation. In the abstract, of course, there is always direct separate demand for products: assuming choice is available at zero cost, consumers will prefer it to no choice. Only when the efficiencies from bundling are dominated by the benefits to choice for enough consumers, however, will we actually observe consumers making independent purchases. In other words, perceptible separate demand is inversely proportional to net efficiencies. On the supply side, firms without market power will bundle two goods only when the cost savings from joint sale outweigh the value consumers place on separate choice. So bundling by all competitive firms implies strong net efficiencies. If a court finds either that there is no noticeable separate demand for the tied product or, there being no convincing direct evidence of separate demand, that the entire "competitive fringe" engages in the same behavior as the defendant, 10 AREEDA ET AL., ANTITRUST LAW ¶ 1744c4, at 200, then the tying and tied products should be declared one product and per se liability should be rejected.

Before concluding our exegesis of Jefferson Parish's separate-products test, we should clarify two things. First, Jefferson Parish does not endorse a direct inquiry into the efficiencies of a bundle. Rather, it proposes easy-to-administer proxies for net efficiency. In describing the separate-products test we discuss efficiencies only to explain the rationale behind the consumer demand inquiry. To allow the separate-products test to become a detailed inquiry into possible welfare consequences would turn a screening test into the very process it is expected to render unnecessary. 10 AREEDA ET AL., ANTITRUST LAW ¶ ¶ 1741b & c, at 180-85; see also Jefferson Parish, 466 U.S. at 34-35 (O'Connor, J., concurring).

Second, the separate-products test is not a one-sided inquiry into the cost savings from a bundle. Although Jefferson Parish acknowledged that prior lower court cases looked at cost-savings to decide separate products, see id. at 22 n.35, the Court conspicuously did not adopt that approach in its disposition of tying arrangement before it. Instead it chose proxies that balance costs savings against reduction in consumer choice.

With this background, we now turn to the separate-products inquiry before us. The District Court found that many consumers, if given the option, would choose their browser separately from the OS. Findings of Fact ¶ 151 (noting that "corporate consumers ... prefer to standardize on the same browser across different [OSs]" at the workplace). Turning to industry custom, the court found that, although all major OS vendors bundled browsers with their OSs, these companies either sold versions without a browser, or allowed OEMs or end-users either not to install the bundled browser or in any event to "uninstall" it. Id. ¶ 153. The court did not discuss the record evidence as to whether OS vendors other than Microsoft sold at a bundled price, with no discount for a browserless OS, perhaps because the record evidence on the issue was in conflict. Compare, e.g., Direct Testimony of Richard Schmalensee ¶ 241, reprinted in 7 J.A. at 4315 ("[A]ll major operating system vendors do in fact include Web-browsing software with the operating system at no extra charge.") (emphasis added), with, e.g., 1/6/99 pm Tr. at 42 (trial testimony of Franklin Fisher of MIT) (suggesting all OSs but Microsoft offer discounts).

Microsoft does not dispute that many consumers demand alternative browsers. But on industry custom Microsoft contends that no other firm requires non-removal because no other firm has invested the resources to integrate web browsing as deeply into its OS as Microsoft has. Appellant's Opening Br. at 25; cf. Direct Testimony of James Allchin ¶ ¶ 262-72, reprinted in 5 J.A. at 3385-89 (Apple, IBM); 11/5/98 pm Tr. at 55-58 (trial testimony of Apple's Avadis Tevanian, Jr.), reprinted in 9 J.A. at 5507-10 (Apple). (We here use the term "integrate" in the rather simple sense of converting individual goods into components of a single physical object (e.g., a computer as it leaves the OEM, or a disk or sets of disks), without any normative implication that such integration is desirable or achieves special advantages. Cf. United States v. Microsoft Corp., 147 F.3d 935, 950 (D.C. Cir. 1998) ("Microsoft II").) Microsoft contends not only that its integration of IE into Windows is innovative and beneficial but also that it requires non-removal of IE. In our discussion of monopoly maintenance we find that these claims fail the efficiency balancing applicable in that context. But the separate-products analysis is supposed to perform its function as a proxy without embarking on any direct analysis of efficiency. Accordingly, Microsoft's implicit argument—that in this case looking to a competitive fringe is inadequate to evaluate fully its potentially innovative technological integration, that such a comparison is between apples and oranges—poses a legitimate objection to the operation of Jefferson Parish's separate-products test for the per se rule.

In fact there is merit to Microsoft's broader argument that Jefferson Parish's consumer demand test would "chill innovation to the detriment of consumers by preventing firms from integrating into their products new functionality previously provided by standalone products—and hence, by definition, subject to separate consumer demand." Appellant's Opening Br. at 69. The per se rule's direct consumer demand and indirect industry custom inquiries are, as a general matter, backward-looking and therefore systematically poor proxies for overall efficiency in the presence of new and innovative integration. See 10 AREEDA ET AL., ANTITRUST LAW ¶ 1746, at 224-29; Amicus Brief of Lawrence Lessig at 24-25, and sources cited therein (brief submitted regarding Conclusions of Law). The direct consumer demand test focuses on historic consumer behavior, likely before integration, and the indirect industry custom test looks at firms that, unlike the defendant, may not have integrated the tying and tied goods. Both tests compare incomparables—the defendant's decision to bundle in the presence of integration, on the one hand, and consumer and competitor calculations in its absence, on the other. If integration has efficiency benefits, these may be ignored by the Jefferson Parish proxies. Because one cannot be sure beneficial integration will be protected by the other elements of the per se rule, simple application of that rule's separate-products test may make consumers worse off.

In light of the monopoly maintenance section, obviously, we do not find that Microsoft's integration is welfare-enhancing or that it should be absolved of tying liability. Rather, we heed Microsoft's warning that the separate-products element of the per se rule may not give newly integrated products a fair shake.

B. Per Se Analysis Inappropriate for this Case.

We now address directly the larger question as we see it: whether standard per se analysis should be applied "off the shelf" to evaluate the defendant's tying arrangement, one which involves software that serves as a platform for third-party applications. There is no doubt that "[i]t is far too late in the history of our antitrust jurisprudence to question the proposition that certain tying arrangements pose an unacceptable risk of stifling competition and therefore are unreasonable 'per se.' " Jefferson Parish, 466 U.S. at 9 (emphasis added). But there are strong reasons to doubt that the integration of additional software functionality into an OS falls among these arrangements. Applying per se analysis to such an amalgamation creates undue risks of error and of deterring welfare-enhancing innovation.

The Supreme Court has warned that " '[i]t is only after considerable experience with certain business relationships that courts classify them as per se violations....' " Broad. Music, 441 U.S. at 9 (quoting Topco Assocs., 405 U.S. at 607-08); accord Cont'l T.V., Inc. v. GTE Sylvania Inc., 433 U.S. 36, 47-59 (1977); White Motor Co. v. United States, 372 U.S. 253, 263 (1963); Jerrold Elecs., 187 F. Supp. at 555-58, 560-61; see also Frank H. Easterbrook, Allocating Antitrust Decisionmaking Tasks, 76 GEO. L.J. 305, 308 (1987). Yet the sort of tying arrangement attacked here is unlike any the Supreme Court has considered. The early Supreme Court cases on tying dealt with arrangements whereby the sale or lease of a patented product was conditioned on the purchase of certain unpatented products from the patentee. See Motion Picture Patents, 243 U.S. 502 (1917); United Shoe Mach., 258 U.S. 451 (1922); IBM Corp. v. United States, 298 U.S. 131 (1936); Int'l Salt, 332 U.S. 392 (1947). Later Supreme Court tying cases did not involve market power derived from patents, but continued to involve contractual ties. See Times-Picayune, 345 U.S. 594 (1953) (defendant newspaper conditioned the purchase of ads in its evening edition on the purchase of ads in its morning edition); N. Pac. Ry., 356 U.S. 1 (1958) (defendant railroad leased land only on the condition that products manufactured on the land be shipped on its railways); United States v. Loew's Inc., 371 U.S. 38 (1962) (defendant distributor of copyrighted feature films conditioned the sale of desired films on the purchase of undesired films); U.S. Steel Corp. v. Fortner Enters., Inc., 429 U.S. 610 (1977) ("Fortner II") (defendant steel company conditioned access to low interest loans on the purchase of the defendant's prefabricated homes); Jefferson Parish, 466 U.S. 2 (1984) (defendant hospital conditioned use of its operating rooms on the purchase of anesthesiological services from a medical group associated with the hospital); Eastman Kodak, 504 U.S. 451 (1992) (defendant photocopying machine manufacturer conditioned the sale of replacement parts for its machines on the use of the defendant's repair services).

In none of these cases was the tied good physically and technologically integrated with the tying good. Nor did the defendants ever argue that their tie improved the value of the tying product to users and to makers of complementary goods. In those cases where the defendant claimed that use of the tied good made the tying good more valuable to users, the Court ruled that the same result could be achieved via quality standards for substitutes of the tied good. See, e.g., Int'l Salt, 332 U.S. at 397-98; IBM, 298 U.S. at 138-40. Here Microsoft argues that IE and Windows are an integrated physical product and that the bundling of IE APIs with Windows makes the latter a better applications platform for third-party software. It is unclear how the benefits from IE APIs could be achieved by quality standards for different browser manufacturers. We do not pass judgment on Microsoft's claims regarding the benefits from integration of its APIs. We merely note that these and other novel, purported efficiencies suggest that judicial "experience" provides little basis for believing that, "because of their pernicious effect on competition and lack of any redeeming virtue," a software firm's decisions to sell multiple functionalities as a package should be "conclusively presumed to be unreasonable and therefore illegal without elaborate inquiry as to the precise harm they have caused or the business excuse for their use." N. Pac. Ry., 356 U.S. at 5 (emphasis added).

Nor have we found much insight into software integration among the decisions of lower federal courts. Most tying cases in the computer industry involve bundling with hardware. See, e.g., Digital Equip. Corp. v. Uniq Digital Techs., Inc., 73 F.3d 756, 761 (7th Cir. 1996) (Easterbrook, J.) (rejecting with little discussion the notion that bundling of OS with a computer is a tie of two separate products); Datagate, Inc. v. Hewlett-Packard Co., 941 F.2d 864, 870 (9th Cir. 1991) (holding that plaintiff's allegation that defendant conditioned its software on purchase of its hardware was sufficient to survive summary judgment); Digidyne Corp. v. Data Gen. Corp., 734 F.2d 1336, 1341-47 (9th Cir. 1984) (holding that defendant's conditioning the sale of its OS on the purchase of its CPU constitutes a per se tying violation); Cal. Computer Prods., 613 F.2d at 743-44 (holding that defendant's integration into its CPU of a disk controller designed for its own disk drives was a useful innovation and not an impermissible attempt to monopolize); ILC Peripherals Leasing Corp. v. IBM Corp., 448 F. Supp. 228, 233 (N.D. Cal. 1978) (finding that defendant's integration of magnetic disks and a head/disk assembly was not an unlawful tie), aff'd per curiam sub. nom. Memorex Corp. v. IBM Corp., 636 F.2d 1188 (9th Cir. 1980); see also Transamerica Computer Co. v. IBM Corp., 698 F.2d 1377, 1382-83 (9th Cir. 1983) (finding lawful defendant's design changes that rendered plaintiff peripheral maker's tape drives incompatible with the defendant's CPU). The hardware case that most resembles the present one is Telex Corp. v. IBM Corp., 367 F. Supp. 258 (N.D. Okla. 1973), rev'd on other grounds, 510 F.2d 894 (10th Cir. 1975). Just as Microsoft integrated web browsing into its OS, IBM in the 1970s integrated memory into its CPUs, a hardware platform. A peripheral manufacturer alleged a tying violation, but the District Court dismissed the claim because it thought it inappropriate to enmesh the courts in product design decisions. Id. at 347. The court's discussion of the tying claim was brief and did not dwell on the effects of the integration on competition or efficiencies. Nor did the court consider whether per se analysis of the alleged tie was wise.

We have found four antitrust cases involving arrangements in which a software program is tied to the purchase of a software platform—two district court cases and two appellate court cases, including one from this court. The first case, Innovation Data Processing, Inc. v. IBM Corp., 585 F. Supp. 1470 (D.N.J. 1984), involved an allegation that IBM bundled with its OS a utility used to transfer data from a tape drive to a computer's disk drive. Although the court mentioned the efficiencies achieved by bundling, it ultimately dismissed the per se tying claim because IBM sold a discounted version of the OS without the utility. Id. at 1475-76. The second case, A.I. Root Co. v. Computer/Dynamics, Inc., 806 F.2d 673 (6th Cir. 1986), was brought by a business customer who claimed that an OS manufacturer illegally conditioned the sale of its OS on the purchase of other software applications. The court quickly disposed of the case on the ground that defendant Computer/Dynamics had no market power. Id. at 675-77. There was no mention of the efficiencies from the tie. The third case, Caldera, Inc. v. Microsoft Corp., 72 F. Supp. 2d 1295 (D. Utah 1999), involved a complaint that the technological integration of MS-DOS and Windows 3.1 into Windows 95 constituted a per se tying violation. The court formulated the "single product" issue in terms of whether the tie constituted a technological improvement, ultimately concluding that Microsoft was not entitled to summary judgment on that issue. Id. at 1322-28.

The software case that bears the greatest resemblance to that at bar is, not surprisingly, Microsoft II, 147 F.3d 935, where we examined the bundling of IE with Windows 95. But the issue there was whether the bundle constituted an "integrated product" as the term was used in a 1994 consent decree between the Department of Justice and Microsoft. Id. at 939. We did not consider whether Microsoft's bundling should be condemned as per se illegal. We certainly did not make any finding that bundling IE with Windows had "no purpose except stifling of competition," White Motor, 372 U.S. at 263, an important consideration in defining the scope of any of antitrust law's per se rules, see Cont'l T.V., 433 U.S. at 57-59. While we believed our interpretation of the term "integrated product" was consistent with the test for separate products under tying law, we made clear that the "antitrust question is of course distinct." Microsoft II, 147 F.3d at 950 n.14. We even cautioned that our conclusion that IE and Windows 95 were integrated was "subject to reexamination on a more complete record." Id. at 952. To the extent that the decision completely disclaimed judicial capacity to evaluate "high-tech product design," id., it cannot be said to conform to prevailing antitrust doctrine (as opposed to resolution of the decree-interpretation issue then before us). In any case, mere review of asserted breaches of a consent decree hardly constitutes enough "experience" to warrant application of per se analysis. See Broad. Music, 441 U.S. at 10-16 (refusing to apply per se analysis to defendant's blanket licenses even though those licenses had been thoroughly investigated by the Department of Justice and were the subject of a consent decree that had been reviewed by numerous courts).

While the paucity of cases examining software bundling suggests a high risk that per se analysis may produce inaccurate results, the nature of the platform software market affirmatively suggests that per se rules might stunt valuable innovation. We have in mind two reasons.

First, as we explained in the previous section, the separate-products test is a poor proxy for net efficiency from newly integrated products. Under per se analysis the first firm to merge previously distinct functionalities (e.g., the inclusion of starter motors in automobiles) or to eliminate entirely the need for a second function (e.g., the invention of the stain-resistant carpet) risks being condemned as having tied two separate products because at the moment of integration there will appear to be a robust "distinct" market for the tied product. See 10 AREEDA ET AL., ANTITRUST LAW ¶ 1746, at 224. Rule of reason analysis, however, affords the first mover an opportunity to demonstrate that an efficiency gain from its "tie" adequately offsets any distortion of consumer choice. See Grappone, Inc. v. Subaru of New England, Inc., 858 F.2d 792, 799 (1st Cir. 1988) (Breyer, J.); see also Town Sound & Custom Tops, Inc. v. Chrysler Motor Corp., 959 F.2d 468, 482 (3d Cir. 1992); Kaiser Aluminum & Chem. Sales, Inc. v. Avondale Shipyards, Inc., 677 F.2d 1045, 1048-49 n.5 (5th Cir. 1982).

The failure of the separate-products test to screen out certain cases of productive integration is particularly troubling in platform software markets such as that in which the defendant competes. Not only is integration common in such markets, but it is common among firms without market power. We have already reviewed evidence that nearly all competitive OS vendors also bundle browsers. Moreover, plaintiffs do not dispute that OS vendors can and do incorporate basic internet plumbing and other useful functionality into their OSs. See Direct Testimony of Richard Schmalensee ¶ 508, reprinted in 7 J.A. at 4462-64 (disk defragmentation, memory management, peer-to-peer networking or file sharing); 11/19/98 am Tr. at 82-83 (trial testimony of Frederick Warren-Boulton), reprinted in 10 J.A. at 6427-28 (TCP/IP stacks). Firms without market power have no incentive to package different pieces of software together unless there are efficiency gains from doing so. The ubiquity of bundling in competitive platform software markets should give courts reason to pause before condemning such behavior in less competitive markets.

Second, because of the pervasively innovative character of platform software markets, tying in such markets may produce efficiencies that courts have not previously encountered and thus the Supreme Court had not factored into the per se rule as originally conceived. For example, the bundling of a browser with OSs enables an independent software developer to count on the presence of the browser's APIs, if any, on consumers' machines and thus to omit them from its own package. See Direct Testimony of Richard Schmalensee ¶ ¶ 230-31, 234, reprinted in 7 J.A. at 4309-11, 4312; Direct Testimony of Michael Devlin ¶ ¶ 12-21, reprinted in 5 J.A. at 3525-29; see also Findings of Fact ¶ 2. It is true that software developers can bundle the browser APIs they need with their own products, see id. ¶ 193, but that may force consumers to pay twice for the same API if it is bundled with two different software programs. It is also true that OEMs can include APIs with the computers they sell, id., but diffusion of uniform APIs by that route may be inferior. First, many OEMs serve special subsets of Windows consumers, such as home or corporate or academic users. If just one of these OEMs decides not to bundle an API because it does not benefit enough of its clients, ISVs that use that API might have to bundle it with every copy of their program. Second, there may be a substantial lag before all OEMs bundle the same set of APIs—a lag inevitably aggravated by the first phenomenon. In a field where programs change very rapidly, delays in the spread of a necessary element (here, the APIs) may be very costly. Of course, these arguments may not justify Microsoft's decision to bundle APIs in this case, particularly because Microsoft did not merely bundle with Windows the APIs from IE, but an entire browser application (sometimes even without APIs, see id.).

A justification for bundling a component of software may not be one for bundling the entire software package, especially given the malleability of software code. See id. ¶ ¶ 162-63; 12/9/98 am Tr. at 17 (trial testimony of David Farber); 1/6/99 am Tr. at 6-7 (trial testimony of Franklin Fisher), reprinted in 11 J.A. at 7192-93; Direct Testimony of Joachim Kempin ¶ 286, reprinted in 6 J.A. at 3749. Furthermore, the interest in efficient API diffusion obviously supplies a far stronger justification for simple price-bundling than for Microsoft's contractual or technological bars to subsequent removal of functionality. But our qualms about redefining the boundaries of a defendant's product and the possibility of consumer gains from simplifying the work of applications developers makes us question any hard and fast approach to tying in OS software markets.

There may also be a number of efficiencies that, although very real, have been ignored in the calculations underlying the adoption of a per se rule for tying. We fear that these efficiencies are common in technologically dynamic markets where product development is especially unlikely to follow an easily foreseen linear pattern. Take the following example from ILC Peripherals, 448 F. Supp. 228, a case concerning the evolution of disk drives for computers. When IBM first introduced such drives in 1956, it sold an integrated product that contained magnetic disks and disk heads that read and wrote data onto disks. Id. at 231. Consumers of the drives demanded two functions—to store data and to access it all at once. In the first few years consumers' demand for storage increased rapidly, outpacing the evolution of magnetic disk technology. To satisfy that demand IBM made it possible for consumers to remove the magnetic disks from drives, even though that meant consumers would not have access to data on disks removed from the drive. This componentization enabled makers of computer peripherals to sell consumers removable disks. Id. at 231-32. Over time, however, the technology of magnetic disks caught up with demand for capacity, so that consumers needed few removable disks to store all their data. At this point IBM reintegrated disks into their drives, enabling consumers to once again have immediate access to all their data without a sacrifice in capacity. Id. A manufacturer of removable disks sued. But the District Court found the tie justified because it satisfied consumer demand for immediate access to all data, and ruled that disks and disk heads were one product. Id. at 233. A court hewing more closely to the truncated analysis contemplated by Northern Pacific Railway would perhaps have overlooked these consumer benefits.

These arguments all point to one conclusion: we cannot comfortably say that bundling in platform software markets has so little "redeeming virtue," N. Pac. Ry., 356 U.S. at 5, and that there would be so "very little loss to society" from its ban, that "an inquiry into its costs in the individual case [can be] considered [ ] unnecessary." Jefferson Parish, 466 U.S. at 33-34 (O'Connor, J., concurring). We do not have enough empirical evidence regarding the effect of Microsoft's practice on the amount of consumer surplus created or consumer choice foreclosed by the integration of added functionality into platform software to exercise sensible judgment regarding that entire class of behavior. (For some issues we have no data.) "We need to know more than we do about the actual impact of these arrangements on competition to decide whether they ... should be classified as per se violations of the Sherman Act." White Motor, 372 U.S. at 263. Until then, we will heed the wisdom that "easy labels do not always supply ready answers," Broad. Music, 441 U.S. at 8, and vacate the District Court's finding of per se tying liability under Sherman Act § 1. We remand the case for evaluation of Microsoft's tying arrangements under the rule of reason. See Pullman-Standard v. Swint, 456 U.S. 273, 292 (1982) ("[W]here findings are infirm because of an erroneous view of the law, a remand is the proper course unless the record permits only one resolution of the factual issue."). That rule more freely permits consideration of the benefits of bundling in software markets, particularly those for OSs, and a balancing of these benefits against the costs to consumers whose ability to make direct price/quality tradeoffs in the tied market may have been impaired. See Jefferson Parish, 466 U.S. at 25 nn.41-42 (noting that per se rule does not broadly permit consideration of procompetitive justifications); id. at 34-35 (O'Connor, J., concurring); N. Pac. Ry., 356 U.S. at 5.

Our judgment regarding the comparative merits of the per se rule and the rule of reason is confined to the tying arrangement before us, where the tying product is software whose major purpose is to serve as a platform for third-party applications and the tied product is complementary software functionality. While our reasoning may at times appear to have broader force, we do not have the confidence to speak to facts outside the record, which contains scant discussion of software integration generally. Microsoft's primary justification for bundling IE APIs is that their inclusion with Windows increases the value of third-party software (and Windows) to consumers. See Appellant's Opening Br. at 41-43. Because this claim applies with distinct force when the tying product is platform software, we have no present basis for finding the per se rule inapplicable to software markets generally. Nor should we be interpreted as setting a precedent for switching to the rule of reason every time a court identifies an efficiency justification for a tying arrangement. Our reading of the record suggests merely that integration of new functionality into platform software is a common practice and that wooden application of per se rules in this litigation may cast a cloud over platform innovation in the market for PCs, network computers and information appliances.

C. On Remand

Should plaintiffs choose to pursue a tying claim under the rule of reason, we note the following for the benefit of the trial court:

First, on remand, plaintiffs must show that Microsoft's conduct unreasonably restrained competition. Meeting that burden "involves an inquiry into the actual effect" of Microsoft's conduct on competition in the tied good market, Jefferson Parish, 466 U.S. at 29, the putative market for browsers. To the extent that certain aspects of tying injury may depend on a careful definition of the tied good market and a showing of barriers to entry other than the tying arrangement itself, plaintiffs would have to establish these points. See Jefferson Parish, 466 U.S. at 29 ("This competition [among anesthesiologists] takes place in a market that has not been defined."); id. at 29 n.48 ("[N]either the District Court nor the Court of Appeals made any findings concerning the contract's effect on entry barriers."). But plaintiffs were required—and had every incentive—to provide both a definition of the browser market and barriers to entry to that market as part of their § 2 attempted monopolization claim; yet they failed to do so. See supra Section III. Accordingly, on remand of the § 1 tying claim, plaintiffs will be precluded from arguing any theory of harm that depends on a precise definition of browsers or barriers to entry (for example, network effects from Internet protocols and extensions embedded in a browser) other than what may be implicit in Microsoft's tying arrangement.

Of the harms left, plaintiffs must show that Microsoft's conduct was, on balance, anticompetitive. Microsoft may of course offer procompetitive justifications, and it is plaintiffs' burden to show that the anticompetitive effect of the conduct outweighs its benefit.

Second, the fact that we have already considered some of the behavior plaintiffs allege to constitute tying violations in the monopoly maintenance section does not resolve the § 1 inquiry. The two practices that plaintiffs have most ardently claimed as tying violations are, indeed, a basis for liability under plaintiffs' § 2 monopoly maintenance claim. These are Microsoft's refusal to allow OEMs to uninstall IE or remove it from the Windows desktop, Findings of Fact ¶ ¶ 158, 203, 213, and its removal of the IE entry from the Add/Remove Programs utility in Windows 98, id. ¶ 170. See supra Section II.B. In order for the District Court to conclude these practices also constitute § 1 tying violations, plaintiffs must demonstrate that their benefits—if any, see supra Sections II.B.1.b and II.B.2.b; Findings of Fact ¶ ¶ 176, 186, 193—are outweighed by the harms in the tied product market. See Jefferson Parish, 466 U.S. at 29. If the District Court is convinced of net harm, it must then consider whether any additional remedy is necessary.

In Section II.B we also considered another alleged tying violation—the Windows 98 override of a consumer's choice of default web browser. We concluded that this behavior does not provide a distinct basis for § 2 liability because plaintiffs failed to rebut Microsoft's proffered justification by demonstrating that harms in the operating system market outweigh Microsoft's claimed benefits. See supra Section II.B. On remand, however, although Microsoft may offer the same procompetitive justification for the override, plaintiffs must have a new opportunity to rebut this claim, by demonstrating that the anticompetitive effect in the browser market is greater than these benefits.

Finally, the District Court must also consider an alleged tying violation that we did not consider under § 2 monopoly maintenance: price bundling. First, the court must determine if Microsoft indeed price bundled—that is, was Microsoft's charge for Windows and IE higher than its charge would have been for Windows alone? This will require plaintiffs to resolve the tension between Findings of Fact ¶ ¶ 136-37, which Microsoft interprets as saying that no part of the bundled price of Windows can be attributed to IE, and Conclusions of Law, at 50, which says the opposite. Compare Direct Testimony of Paul Maritz ¶ ¶ 37, 296, reprinted in 6 J.A. at 3656, 3753-54 (Microsoft did not "charge separately" for IE, but like all other major OS vendors included browsing software at "no extra charge"), with GX 202 at MS7 004343, esp. 004347, reprinted in 22 J.A. at 14459, esp. 14463 (memo from Christian Wildfeuer describing focus group test used to price Windows 98 with IE 4), and GX 1371 at MS7 003729-30, 003746, 003748, esp. 003750, reprinted in 15 J.A. at 10306-07, 10323, 10325, esp. 10327 (Windows 98 pricing and marketing memo), and Findings of Fact ¶ 63 (identifying GX 202 as the basis for Windows 98 pricing).

If there is a positive price increment in Windows associated with IE (we know there is no claim of price predation), plaintiffs must demonstrate that the anticompetitive effects of Microsoft's price bundling outweigh any procompetitive justifications the company provides for it. In striking this balance, the District Court should consider, among other things, indirect evidence of efficiency provided by "the competitive fringe." See supra Section IV.A. Although this inquiry may overlap with the separate-products screen under the per se rule, that is not its role here. Because courts applying the rule of reason are free to look at both direct and indirect evidence of efficiencies from a tie, there is no need for a screening device as such; thus the separate-products inquiry serves merely to classify arrangements as subject to tying law, as opposed to, say, liability for exclusive dealing. See Times-Picayune, 345 U.S. at 614 (finding a single product and then turning to a general rule of reason analysis under § 1, though not using the term "tying"); Foster v. Md. State Sav. & Loan Ass'n, 590 F.2d 928, 931, 933 (D.C. Cir. 1978), cited in Jefferson Parish, 466 U.S. at 40 (O'Connor, J., concurring) (same); see also Chawla v. Shell Oil Co., 75 F. Supp. 2d 626, 635, 643-44 (S.D. Tex. 1999) (considering a rule of reason tying claim after finding a single product under the per se rule); Montgomery County Ass'n of Realtors v. Realty Photo Master Corp., 783 F. Supp. 952, 961 & n.26 (D. Md. 1992), aff'd mem. 993 F.2d 1538 (4th Cir. 1993) (same).

If OS vendors without market power also sell their software bundled with a browser, the natural inference is that sale of the items as a bundle serves consumer demand and that unbundled sale would not, for otherwise a competitor could profitably offer the two products separately and capture sales of the tying good from vendors that bundle. See 10 AREEDA ET AL., ANTITRUST LAW ¶ 1744b, at 197-98. It does appear that most if not all firms have sold a browser with their OSs at a bundled price, beginning with IBM and its OS/2 Warp OS in September 1994, Findings of Fact ¶ 140; see also Direct Testimony of Richard Schmalensee ¶ 212, reprinted in 7 J.A. at 4300-01, and running to current versions of Apple's Mac OS, Caldera and Red Hat's Linux OS, Sun's Solaris OS, Be's BeOS, Santa Cruz Operation's UnixWare, Novell's NetWare OS, and others, see Findings of Fact ¶ 153; Direct Testimony of Richard Schmalensee ¶ ¶ 215-23, 230, esp. table 5, reprinted in 7 J.A. at 4302-05, 4310; Direct Testimony of James Allchin ¶ ¶ 261-77, reprinted in 5 J.A. at 3384-92.

Of course price bundling by competitive OS makers would tend to exonerate Microsoft only if the sellers in question sold their browser/OS combinations exclusively at a bundled price. If a competitive seller offers a discount for a browserless version, then—at least as to its OS and browser—the gains from bundling are outweighed by those from separate choice. The evidence on discounts appears to be in conflict. Compare Direct Testimony of Richard Schmalensee ¶ 241, reprinted in 7 J.A. at 4315, with 1/6/99 pm Tr. at 42 (trial testimony of Franklin Fisher). If Schmalensee is correct that nearly all OS makers do not offer a discount, then the harm from tying—obstruction of direct consumer choice—would be theoretically created by virtually all sellers: a customer who would prefer an alternate browser is forced to pay the full price of that browser even though its value to him is only the increment in value over the bundled browser. (The result is similar to that from non-removal, which forces consumers who want the alternate browser to surrender disk space taken up by the unused, bundled browser.) If the failure to offer a price discount were universal, any impediment to direct consumer choice created by Microsoft's price-bundled sale of IE with Windows would be matched throughout the market; yet these OS suppliers on the competitive fringe would have evidently found this price bundling on balance efficient. If Schmalensee's assertions are ill-founded, of course, no such inference could be drawn.

V. Trial Proceedings and Remedy

Microsoft additionally challenges the District Court's procedural rulings on two fronts. First, with respect to the trial phase, Microsoft proposes that the court mismanaged its docket by adopting an expedited trial schedule and receiving evidence through summary witnesses. Second, with respect to the remedies decree, Microsoft argues that the court improperly ordered that it be divided into two separate companies. Only the latter claim will long detain us. The District Court's trial-phase procedures were comfortably within the bounds of its broad discretion to conduct trials as it sees fit. We conclude, however, that the District Court's remedies decree must be vacated for three independent reasons: (1) the court failed to hold a remedies-specific evidentiary hearing when there were disputed facts; (2) the court failed to provide adequate reasons for its decreed remedies; and (3) this Court has revised the scope of Microsoft's liability and it is impossible to determine to what extent that should affect the remedies provisions.

A. Factual Background

On April 3, 2000, the District Court concluded the liability phase of the proceedings by the filing of its Conclusions of Law holding that Microsoft had violated §§ 1 and 2 of the Sherman Act. The court and the parties then began discussions of the procedures to be followed in the imposition of remedies. Initially, the District Court signaled that it would enter relief only after conducting a new round of proceedings. In its Conclusions of Law, the court stated that it would issue a remedies order "following proceedings to be established by further Order of the Court." Conclusions of Law, at 57. And, when during a post-trial conference, Microsoft's counsel asked whether the court "contemplate[d] further proceedings," the judge replied, "Yes. Yes. I assume that there would be further proceedings." 4/4/00 Tr. at 8-9, 11, reprinted in 4 J.A. at 2445-46, 2448. The District Court further speculated that those proceedings might "replicate the procedure at trial with testimony in written form subject to cross-examination." Id. at 11, reprinted in 4 J.A. at 2448.

On April 28, 2000, plaintiffs submitted their proposed final judgment, accompanied by six new supporting affidavits and several exhibits. In addition to a series of temporary conduct restrictions, plaintiffs proposed that Microsoft be split into two independent corporations, with one continuing Microsoft's operating systems business and the other undertaking the balance of Microsoft's operations. Plaintiffs' Proposed Final Judgment at 2-3, reprinted in 4 J.A. at 2473-74. Microsoft filed a "summary response" on May 10, contending both that the proposed decree was too severe and that it would be impossible to resolve certain remedies-specific factual disputes "on a highly expedited basis." Defendant's Summary

Response at 6-7, reprinted in 4 J.A. at 2587-88. Another May 10 submission argued that if the District Court considered imposing plaintiffs' proposed remedy, "then substantial discovery, adequate time for preparation and a full trial on relief will be required." Defendant's Position as to Future Proceedings at 2, reprinted in 4 J.A. at 2646.

After the District Court revealed during a May 24 hearing that it was prepared to enter a decree without conducting "any further process," 5/24/00 pm Tr. at 33, reprinted in 14 J.A. at 9866, Microsoft renewed its argument that the underlying factual disputes between the parties necessitated a remedies-specific evidentiary hearing. In two separate offers of proof, Microsoft offered to produce a number of pieces of evidence, including the following:

- Testimony from Dr. Robert Crandall, a Senior Fellow at the Brookings Institution, that divestiture and dissolution orders historically have "failed to improve economic welfare by reducing prices or increasing output." Defendant's Offer of Proof at 2, reprinted in 4 J.A. at 2743.

- Testimony from Professor Kenneth Elzinga, Professor of Economics at the University of Virginia, that plaintiffs' proposed remedies would not induce entry into the operating systems market. Id. at 4, reprinted in 4 J.A. at 2745.

- Testimony from Dean Richard Schmalensee, Dean of MIT's Sloan School of Management, that dividing Microsoft likely would "harm consumers through higher prices, lower output, reduced efficiency, and less innovation" and would "produce immediate, substantial increases in the prices of both Windows and Office." Id. at 8, reprinted in 4 J.A. at 2749. Indeed, it would cause the price of Windows to triple. Id.

- Testimony from Goldman, Sachs & Co. and from Morgan Stanley Dean Witter that dissolution would adversely affect shareholder value. Id. at 17, 19, reprinted in 4 J.A. at 2758, 2760.

- Testimony from Microsoft Chairman Bill Gates that dividing Microsoft "along the arbitrary lines proposed by the Government" would devastate the company's proposed Next Generation Windows Services platform, which would allow software developers to write web-based applications that users could access from a wide range of devices. Id. at 21-22, reprinted in 4 J.A. at 2762-63.

- Testimony from Steve Ballmer, Microsoft's President and CEO, that Microsoft is organized as a unified company and that "there are no natural lines along which Microsoft could be broken up without causing serious problems." Id. at 23, reprinted in 4 J.A. at 2764.

- Testimony from Michael Capellas, CEO of Compaq, that splitting Microsoft in two "will make it more difficult for OEMs to provide customers with the tightly integrated product offerings they demand" in part because "complementary products created by unrelated companies do not work as well together as products created by a single company." Defendant's Supplemental Offer of Proof at 2, reprinted in 4 J.A. at 2823.

Over Microsoft's objections, the District Court proceeded to consider the merits of the remedy and on June 7, 2000 entered its final judgment. The court explained that it would not conduct "extended proceedings on the form a remedy should take," because it doubted that an evidentiary hearing would "give any significantly greater assurance that it will be able to identify what might be generally regarded as an optimum remedy." Final Judgment, at 62. The bulk of Microsoft's proffered facts were simply conjectures about future events, and "[i]n its experience the Court has found testimonial predictions of future events generally less reliable even than testimony as to historical fact, and cross-examination to be of little use in enhancing or detracting from their accuracy." Id. Nor was the court swayed by Microsoft's "profession of surprise" at the possibility of structural relief. Id. at 61. "From the inception of this case Microsoft knew, from well-established Supreme Court precedents dating from the beginning of the last century, that a mandated divestiture was a possibility, if not a probability, in the event of an adverse result at trial." Id.

The substance of the District Court's remedies order is nearly identical to plaintiffs' proposal. The decree's centerpiece is the requirement that Microsoft submit a proposed plan of divestiture, with the company to be split into an "Operating Systems Business," or "OpsCo," and an "Applications Business," or "AppsCo." Final Judgment, Decree §§ 1.a, l.c.i, at 64. OpsCo would receive all of Microsoft's operating systems, such as Windows 98 and Windows 2000, while AppsCo would receive the remainder of Microsoft's businesses, including IE and Office. The District Court identified four reasons for its "reluctant[ ]" conclusion that "a structural remedy has become imperative." Id. at 62. First, Microsoft "does not yet concede that any of its business practices violated the Sherman Act." Id. Second, the company consequently "continues to do business as it has in the past." Id. Third, Microsoft "has proved untrustworthy in the past." Id. And fourth, the Government, whose officials "are by reason of office obliged and expected to consider—and to act in—the public interest," won the case, "and for that reason alone have some entitlement to a remedy of their choice." Id. at 62-63.

The decree also contains a number of interim restrictions on Microsoft's conduct. For instance, Decree § 3.b requires Microsoft to disclose to third-party developers the APIs and other technical information necessary to ensure that software effectively interoperates with Windows. Id. at 67. "To facilitate compliance," § 3.b further requires that Microsoft establish "a secure facility" at which third-party representatives may "study, interrogate and interact with relevant and necessary portions of [Microsoft platform software] source code." Id. Section 3.e, entitled "Ban on Exclusive Dealing," forbids Microsoft from entering contracts which oblige third parties to restrict their "development, production, distribution, promotion or use of, or payment for" non-Microsoft platform-level software. Id. at 68. Under Decree § 3.f—"Ban on Contractual Tying"—the company may not condition its grant of a Windows license on a party's agreement "to license, promote, or distribute any other Microsoft software product." Id. And § 3.g imposes a "Restriction on Binding Middleware Products to Operating System Products" unless Microsoft also offers consumers "an otherwise identical version" of the operating system without the middleware. Id.

B. Trial Proceedings

Microsoft's first contention—that the District Court erred by adopting an expedited trial schedule and receiving evidence through summary witnesses—is easily disposed of. Trial courts have extraordinarily broad discretion to determine the manner in which they will conduct trials. "This is particularly true in a case such as the one at bar where the proceedings are being tried to the court without a jury." Eli Lilly & Co., Inc. v. Generix Drug Sales, Inc., 460 F.2d 1096, 1105 (5th Cir. 1972). In such cases, "[a]n appellate court will not interfere with the trial court's exercise of its discretion to control its docket and dispatch its business ... except upon the clearest showing that the procedures have resulted in actual and substantial prejudice to the complaining litigant." Id. Microsoft fails to clear this high hurdle. Although the company claims that setting an early trial date inhibited its ability to conduct discovery, it never identified a specific deposition or document it was unable to obtain. And while Microsoft now argues that the use of summary witnesses made inevitable the improper introduction of hearsay evidence, the company actually agreed to the District Court's proposal to limit each side to 12 summary witnesses. 12/2/98 am Tr. at 11, reprinted in 21 J.A. at 14083 (court admonishing Microsoft's counsel to "[k]eep in mind that both sides agreed to the number of witnesses"). Even absent Microsoft's agreement, the company's challenge fails to show that this use of summary witnesses falls outside the trial court's wide latitude to receive evidence as it sees fit. General Elec. Co. v. Joiner, 522 U.S. 136, 141-42 (1997). This is particularly true given the presumption that a judge who conducts a bench trial has ignored any inadmissible evidence, Harris v. Rivera, 454 U.S. 339, 346 (1981)—a presumption that Microsoft makes no serious attempt to overcome. Indeed, under appropriate circumstances with appropriate instructions, we have in the past approved the use of summary witnesses even in jury trials. See, e.g., United States v. Lemire, 720 F.2d 1327 (D.C. Cir. 1983). Therefore, neither the use of the summary witnesses nor any other aspect of the District Court's conduct of the trial phase amounted to an abuse of discretion.

C. Failure to Hold an Evidentiary Hearing

The District Court's remedies-phase proceedings are a different matter. It is a cardinal principle of our system of justice that factual disputes must be heard in open court and resolved through trial-like evidentiary proceedings. Any other course would be contrary "to the spirit which imbues our judicial tribunals prohibiting decision without hearing." Sims v. Greene, 161 F.2d 87, 88 (3d Cir. 1947).

A party has the right to judicial resolution of disputed facts not just as to the liability phase, but also as to appropriate relief. "Normally, an evidentiary hearing is required before an injunction may be granted." United States v. McGee, 714 F.2d 607, 613 (6th Cir. 1983); see also Charlton v. Estate of Charlton, 841 F.2d 988, 989 (9th Cir. 1988) ("Generally the entry or continuation of an injunction requires a hearing. Only when the facts are not in dispute, or when the adverse party has waived its right to a hearing, can that significant procedural step be eliminated." (citation and internal quotation marks omitted)). Other than a temporary restraining order, no injunctive relief may be entered without a hearing. See generally FED. R. CIV. P. 65. A hearing on the merits—i.e., a trial on liability—does not substitute for a relief-specific evidentiary hearing unless the matter of relief was part of the trial on liability, or unless there are no disputed factual issues regarding the matter of relief.

This rule is no less applicable in antitrust cases. The Supreme Court "has recognized that a 'full exploration of facts is usually necessary in order (for the District Court) properly to draw (an antitrust) decree' so as 'to prevent future violations and eradicate existing evils.' " United States

v. Ward Baking Co., 376 U.S. 327, 330-31 (1964) (quoting Associated Press v. United States, 326 U.S. 1, 22 (1945)). Hence a remedies decree must be vacated whenever there is "a bona fide disagreement concerning substantive items of relief which could be resolved only by trial." Id. at 334; cf. Sims, 161 F.2d at 89 ("It has never been supposed that a temporary injunction could issue under the Clayton Act without giving the party against whom the injunction was sought an opportunity to present evidence on his behalf.").

Despite plaintiffs' protestations, there can be no serious doubt that the parties disputed a number of facts during the remedies phase. In two separate offers of proof, Microsoft identified 23 witnesses who, had they been permitted to testify, would have challenged a wide range of plaintiffs' factual representations, including the feasibility of dividing Microsoft, the likely impact on consumers, and the effect of divestiture on shareholders. To take but two examples, where plaintiffs' economists testified that splitting Microsoft in two would be socially beneficial, the company offered to prove that the proposed remedy would "cause substantial social harm by raising software prices, lowering rates of innovation and disrupting the evolution of Windows as a software development platform." Defendant's Offer of Proof at 6, reprinted in 4 J.A. at 2747. And where plaintiffs' investment banking experts proposed that divestiture might actually increase shareholder value, Microsoft proffered evidence that structural relief "would inevitably result in a significant loss of shareholder value," a loss that could reach "tens—possibly hundreds—of billions of dollars." Id. at 19, reprinted in 4 J.A. at 2760.

Indeed, the District Court itself appears to have conceded the existence of acute factual disagreements between Microsoft and plaintiffs. The court acknowledged that the parties were "sharply divided" and held "divergent opinions" on the likely results of its remedies decree. Final Judgment, at 62. The reason the court declined to conduct an evidentiary hearing was not because of the absence of disputed facts, but because it believed that those disputes could be resolved only through "actual experience," not further proceedings. Id.

But a prediction about future events is not, as a prediction, any less a factual issue. Indeed, the Supreme Court has acknowledged that drafting an antitrust decree by necessity "involves predictions and assumptions concerning future economic and business events." Ford Motor Co. v. United States, 405 U.S. 562, 578 (1972). Trial courts are not excused from their obligation to resolve such matters through evidentiary hearings simply because they consider the bedrock procedures of our justice system to be "of little use." Final Judgment, at 62.

The presence of factual disputes thus distinguishes this case from the decisions plaintiffs cite for the proposition that Microsoft was not entitled to an evidentiary hearing. Indeed, far from assisting plaintiffs, these cases actually confirm the proposition that courts must hold evidentiary hearings when they are confronted with disputed facts. In Ford Motor Co., the Supreme Court affirmed a divestiture order after emphasizing that the District Court had "held nine days of hearings on the remedy." 405 U.S. at 571. In Davoll v. Webb, 194 F.3d 1116 (10th Cir. 1999), the defendant both failed to submit any offers of proof, and waived its right to an evidentiary hearing by expressly agreeing that relief should be determined based solely on written submissions. Id. at 1142-43. The defendants in American Can Co. v. Mansukhani, 814 F.2d 421 (7th Cir. 1987), were not entitled to a hearing on remedies because they failed "to explain to the district court what new proof they would present to show" that the proposed remedy was unwarranted. Id. at 425. And in Socialist Workers Party v. Illinois State Board of Elections, 566 F.2d 586 (7th Cir. 1977), aff'd, 440 U.S. 173 (1979), the Seventh Circuit held that a remedies-specific hearing was unnecessary because that case involved a pure question of legal interpretation and hence "[t]here was no factual dispute as to the ground on which the injunction was ordered." Id. at 587.

Unlike the parties in Davoll, American Can, and Socialist Workers Party, Microsoft both repeatedly asserted its right to an evidentiary hearing and submitted two offers of proof. The company's "summary response" to the proposed remedy argued that it would be "impossible" to address underlying factual issues "on a highly expedited basis," Defendant's Summary Response at 6-7, reprinted in 4 J.A. at 2587-88, and Microsoft further maintained that the court could not issue a decree unless it first permitted "substantial discovery, adequate time for preparation and a full trial on relief." Defendant's Position as to Future Proceedings at 2, reprinted in 4 J.A. at 2646. And in 53 pages of submissions, Microsoft identified the specific evidence it would introduce to challenge plaintiffs' representations.

Plaintiffs further argue—and the District Court held—that no evidentiary hearing was necessary given that Microsoft long had been on notice that structural relief was a distinct possibility. It is difficult to see why this matters. Whether Microsoft had advance notice that dissolution was in the works is immaterial to whether the District Court violated the company's procedural rights by ordering it without an evidentiary hearing. To be sure, "claimed surprise at the district court's decision to consider permanent injunctive relief does not, alone, merit reversal." Socialist Workers, 566 F.2d at 587. But in this case, Microsoft's professed surprise does not stand "alone." There is something more: the company's basic procedural right to have disputed facts resolved through an evidentiary hearing.

In sum, the District Court erred when it resolved the parties' remedies-phase factual disputes by consulting only the evidence introduced during trial and plaintiffs' remedies-phase submissions, without considering the evidence Microsoft sought to introduce. We therefore vacate the District Court's final judgment, and remand with instructions to conduct a remedies-specific evidentiary hearing.

D. Failure to Provide an Adequate Explanation

We vacate the District Court's remedies decree for the additional reason that the court has failed to provide an adequate explanation for the relief it ordered. The Supreme Court has explained that a remedies decree in an antitrust case must seek to "unfetter a market from anticompetitive conduct," Ford Motor Co., 405 U.S. at 577, to "terminate the illegal monopoly, deny to the defendant the fruits of its statutory violation, and ensure that there remain no practices likely to result in monopolization in the future," United States v. United Shoe Mach. Corp., 391 U.S. 244, 250 (1968); see also United States v. Grinnell Corp., 384 U.S. 563, 577 (1966).

The District Court has not explained how its remedies decree would accomplish those objectives. Indeed, the court devoted a mere four paragraphs of its order to explaining its reasons for the remedy. They are: (1) Microsoft "does not yet concede that any of its business practices violated the Sherman Act"; (2) Microsoft "continues to do business as it has in the past"; (3) Microsoft "has proved untrustworthy in the past"; and (4) the Government, whose officials "are by reason of office obliged and expected to consider—and to act in—the public interest," won the case, "and for that reason alone have some entitlement to a remedy of their choice." Final Judgment, at 62-63. Nowhere did the District Court discuss the objectives the Supreme Court deems relevant.

E. Modification of Liability

Quite apart from its procedural difficulties, we vacate the District Court's final judgment in its entirety for the additional, independent reason that we have modified the underlying bases of liability. Of the three antitrust violations originally identified by the District Court, one is no longer viable: attempted monopolization of the browser market in violation of Sherman Act § 2. One will be remanded for liability proceedings under a different legal standard: unlawful tying in violation of § 1. Only liability for the § 2 monopoly-maintenance violation has been affirmed—and even that we have revised. Ordinarily, of course, we review the grant or denial of equitable relief under the abuse of discretion standard. See, e.g., Doran v. Salem Inn, Inc., 422 U.S. 922, 931-32 (1975) ("[T]he standard of appellate review is simply whether the issuance of the injunction, in the light of the applicable standard, constituted an abuse of discretion."). For obvious reasons, the application of that standard is not sufficient to sustain the remedy in the case before us. We cannot determine whether the District Court has abused its discretion in remedying a wrong where the court did not exercise that discretion in order to remedy the properly determined wrong. That is, the District Court determined that the conduct restrictions and the pervasive structural remedy were together appropriate to remedy the three antitrust violations set forth above. The court did not exercise its discretion to determine whether all, or for that matter, any, of those equitable remedies were required to rectify a § 2 monopoly maintenance violation taken alone. We therefore cannot sustain an exercise of discretion not yet made.

By way of comparison, in Spectrum Sports, Inc. v. McQuillan, 506 U.S. 447 (1993), the Supreme Court reviewed a damages award in a Sherman Act case. In that case, the trial court entered judgment upon a jury verdict which did not differentiate among multiple possible theories of liability under § 2. The Supreme Court ultimately determined that the trial record could not legally support a finding that the defendant had committed an illegal attempt to monopolize, and that "the trial instructions allowed the jury to infer specific intent and dangerous probability of success from the defendants' predatory conduct, without any proof of the relevant market or of a realistic probability that the defendants could achieve monopoly power in that market." Id. at 459. Therefore, the High Court reversed the Ninth Circuit's judgment affirming the District Court and remanded for further proceedings, expressly because "the jury's verdict did not negate the possibility that the § 2 verdict rested on the attempt to monopolize grounds alone...." Id. Similarly, here, we cannot presume that a District Court would exercise its discretion to fashion the same remedy where the erroneous grounds of liability were stripped from its consideration.

The Eighth Circuit confronted a similar problem in Concord Boat Corp. v. Brunswick Corp., 207 F.3d 1039 (8th Cir.), cert. denied, 121 S. Ct. 428 (2000). In that case, a group of boat builders brought an action against an engine manufacturer alleging violations of Sherman Act §§ 1 and 2, and Clayton Act § 7. After a 10-week trial, the jury found Brunswick liable on all three counts and returned a verdict for over $44 million. On appeal, the Eighth Circuit reversed the Clayton Act claim. Id. at 1053. That court held that, as a consequence, it was required to vacate the jury's remedy in its entirety. Because the "verdict form did not require the jury to consider what damages resulted from each type of violation," the court could not "know what damages it found to have been caused by the acquisitions upon which the Section 7 claims were based." Id. at 1054. The court rejected the proposition that "the entire damage award may be upheld based on Brunswick's Sherman Act liability alone," id. at 1053, holding that, because "there is no way to know what damages the jury assigned to the Section 7 claims," the defendant "would be entitled at the very least to a new damages trial on the boat builders' Sherman Act claims," id. at 1054.

Spectrum Sports and Concord Boat are distinguishable from the case before us in that both involved the award of money damages rather than equitable relief. Nonetheless, their reasoning is instructive. A court in both contexts must base its relief on some clear "indication of a significant causal connection between the conduct enjoined or mandated and the violation found directed toward the remedial goal intended." 3 PHILLIP E. AREEDA & HERBERT HOVENKAMP, ANTITRUST LAW ¶ 653(b), at 91-92 (1996). In a case such as the one before us where sweeping equitable relief is employed to remedy multiple violations, and some—indeed most—of the findings of remediable violations do not withstand appellate scrutiny, it is necessary to vacate the remedy decree since the implicit findings of causal connection no longer exist to warrant our deferential affirmance.

In short, we must vacate the remedies decree in its entirety and remand the case for a new determination. This court has drastically altered the District Court's conclusions on liability. On remand, the District Court, after affording the parties a proper opportunity to be heard, can fashion an appropriate remedy for Microsoft's antitrust violations. In particular, the court should consider which of the decree's conduct restrictions remain viable in light of our modification of the original liability decision. While the task of drafting the remedies decree is for the District Court in the first instance, because of the unusually convoluted nature of the proceedings thus far, and a desire to advance the ultimate resolution of this important controversy, we offer some further guidance for the exercise of that discretion.

F. On Remand

As a general matter, a district court is afforded broad discretion to enter that relief it calculates will best remedy the conduct it has found to be unlawful. See, e.g., Woerner v. United States Small Bus. Admin., 934 F.2d 1277, 1279 (D.C. Cir. 1991) (recognizing that an appellate court reviews a trial court's decision whether or not to grant equitable relief only for an abuse of discretion). This is no less true in antitrust cases. See, e.g., Ford Motor Co., 405 U.S. at 573 ("The District Court is clothed with 'large discretion' to fit the decree to the special needs of the individual case."); Md. & Va. Milk Producers Ass'n, Inc. v. United States, 362 U.S. 458, 473 (1960) ("The formulation of decrees is largely left to the discretion of the trial court...."). And divestiture is a common form of relief in successful antitrust prosecutions: it is indeed "the most important of antitrust remedies." See, e.g., United States v. E.I. du Pont de Nemours & Co., 366 U.S. 316, 331 (1961).

On remand, the District Court must reconsider whether the use of the structural remedy of divestiture is appropriate with respect to Microsoft, which argues that it is a unitary company. By and large, cases upon which plaintiffs rely in arguing for the split of Microsoft have involved the dissolution of entities formed by mergers and acquisitions. On the contrary, the Supreme Court has clarified that divestiture "has traditionally been the remedy for Sherman Act violations whose heart is intercorporate combination and control," du Pont, 366 U.S. at 329 (emphasis added), and that "[c]omplete divestiture is particularly appropriate where asset or stock acquisitions violate the antitrust laws," Ford Motor Co., 405 U.S. at 573 (emphasis added).

One apparent reason why courts have not ordered the dissolution of unitary companies is logistical difficulty. As the court explained in United States v. ALCOA, 91 F. Supp.

333, 416 (S.D.N.Y. 1950), a "corporation, designed to operate effectively as a single entity, cannot readily be dismembered of parts of its various operations without a marked loss of efficiency." A corporation that has expanded by acquiring its competitors often has preexisting internal lines of division along which it may more easily be split than a corporation that has expanded from natural growth. Although time and corporate modifications and developments may eventually fade those lines, at least the identifiable entities preexisted to create a template for such division as the court might later decree. With reference to those corporations that are not acquired by merger and acquisition, Judge Wyzanski accurately opined in United Shoe:

> United conducts all machine manufacture at one plant in Beverly, with one set of jigs and tools, one foundry, one laboratory for machinery problems, one managerial staff, and one labor force. It takes no Solomon to see that this organism cannot be cut into three equal and viable parts.

United States v. United Shoe Machine Co., 110 F. Supp. 295, 348 (D. Mass. 1953).

Depending upon the evidence, the District Court may find in a remedies proceeding that it would be no easier to split Microsoft in two than United Shoe in three. Microsoft's Offer of Proof in response to the court's denial of an evidentiary hearing included proffered testimony from its President and CEO Steve Ballmer that the company "is, and always has been, a unified company without free-standing business units. Microsoft is not the result of mergers or acquisitions." Microsoft further offered evidence that it is "not organized along product lines," but rather is housed in a single corporate headquarters and that it has > only one sales and marketing organization which is responsible for selling all of the company's products, one basic research organization, one product support organization, one operations department, one information technology department, one facilities department, one purchasing department, one human resources department, > one finance department, one legal department and one public relations department.

Defendant's Offer of Proof at 23-26, reprinted in 4 J.A. at 2764-67. If indeed Microsoft is a unitary company, division might very well require Microsoft to reproduce each of these departments in each new entity rather than simply allocate the differing departments among them.

In devising an appropriate remedy, the District Court also should consider whether plaintiffs have established a sufficient causal connection between Microsoft's anticompetitive conduct and its dominant position in the OS market. "Mere existence of an exclusionary act does not itself justify full feasible relief against the monopolist to create maximum competition." 3 AREEDA & HOVENKAMP, ANTITRUST LAW ¶ 650a, at 67. Rather, structural relief, which is "designed to eliminate the monopoly altogether ... require[s] a clearer indication of a significant causal connection between the conduct and creation or maintenance of the market power." Id. ¶ 653b, at 91-92 (emphasis added). Absent such causation, the antitrust defendant's unlawful behavior should be remedied by "an injunction against continuation of that conduct." Id. ¶ 650a, at 67.

As noted above, see supra Section II.C, we have found a causal connection between Microsoft's exclusionary conduct and its continuing position in the operating systems market only through inference. See 3 AREEDA & HOVENKAMP, ANTITRUST LAW ¶ 653(b), at 91-92 (suggesting that "more extensive equitable relief, particularly remedies such as divestiture designed to eliminate the monopoly altogether, ... require a clearer indication of significant causal connection between the conduct and creation or maintenance of the market power"). Indeed, the District Court expressly did not adopt the position that Microsoft would have lost its position in the OS market but for its anticompetitive behavior. Findings of Fact ¶ 411 ("There is insufficient evidence to find that, absent Microsoft's actions, Navigator and Java already would have ignited genuine competition in the market for Intel-compatible PC operating systems."). If the court on remand is unconvinced of the causal connection between Microsoft's exclusionary conduct and the company's position in the OS market, it may well conclude that divestiture is not an appropriate remedy.

While we do not undertake to dictate to the District Court the precise form that relief should take on remand, we note again that it should be tailored to fit the wrong creating the occasion for the remedy.

G. Conclusion

In sum, we vacate the District Court's remedies decree for three reasons. First, the District Court failed to hold an evidentiary hearing despite the presence of remedies-specific factual disputes. Second, the court did not provide adequate reasons for its decreed remedies. Finally, we have drastically altered the scope of Microsoft's liability, and it is for the District Court in the first instance to determine the propriety of a specific remedy for the limited ground of liability which we have upheld.

VI. Judicial Misconduct

Canon 3A(6) of the Code of Conduct for United States Judges requires federal judges to "avoid public comment on the merits of [ ] pending or impending" cases. Canon 2 tells judges to "avoid impropriety and the appearance of impropriety in all activities," on the bench and off. Canon 3A(4) forbids judges to initiate or consider ex parte communications on the merits of pending or impending proceedings. Section 455(a) of the Judicial Code requires judges to recuse themselves when their "impartiality might reasonably be questioned." 28 U.S.C. § 455(a).

All indications are that the District Judge violated each of these ethical precepts by talking about the case with reporters. The violations were deliberate, repeated, egregious, and flagrant. The only serious question is what consequences should follow. Microsoft urges us to disqualify the District Judge, vacate the judgment in its entirety and toss out the findings of fact, and remand for a new trial before a different District Judge. At the other extreme, plaintiffs ask us to do nothing. We agree with neither position.

A. The District Judge's Communications with the Press

Immediately after the District Judge entered final judgment on June 7, 2000, accounts of interviews with him began appearing in the press. Some of the interviews were held after he entered final judgment. See Peter Spiegel, Microsoft Judge Defends Post-trial Comments, FIN. TIMES (London), Oct. 7, 2000, at 4; John R. Wilke, For Antitrust Judge, Trust, or Lack of It, Really Was the Issue—In an Interview, Jackson Says Microsoft Did the Damage to Its Credibility in Court, WALL ST. J., June 8, 2000, at A1. The District Judge also aired his views about the case to larger audiences, giving speeches at a college and at an antitrust seminar. See James V. Grimaldi, Microsoft Judge Says Ruling at Risk; Every Trial Decision Called 'Vulnerable', WASH. POST, Sept. 29, 2000, at E1; Alison Schmauch, Microsoft Judge Shares Experiences, THE DARTMOUTH ONLINE, Oct. 3, 2000.

From the published accounts, it is apparent that the Judge also had been giving secret interviews to select reporters before entering final judgment—in some instances long before. The earliest interviews we know of began in September 1999, shortly after the parties finished presenting evidence but two months before the court issued its Findings of Fact. See Joel Brinkley & Steve Lohr, U.S. vs. Microsoft: Pursuing a Giant; Retracing the Missteps in the Microsoft Defense, N.Y. TIMES, June 9, 2000, at A1. Interviews with reporters from the New York Times and Ken Auletta, another reporter who later wrote a book on the Microsoft case, continued throughout late 1999 and the first half of 2000, during which time the Judge issued his Findings of Fact, Conclusions of Law, and Final Judgment. See id.; Ken Auletta, Final Offer, THE NEW YORKER, Jan. 15, 2001, at 40. The Judge "embargoed" these interviews; that is, he insisted that the fact and content of the interviews remain secret until he issued the Final Judgment.

Before we recount the statements attributed to the District Judge, we need to say a few words about the state of the record. All we have are the published accounts and what the reporters say the Judge said. Those accounts were not admitted in evidence. They may be hearsay. See FED. R. EVID. 801(c); Metro. Council of NAACP Branches v. FCC, 46 F.3d 1154, 1165 (D.C. Cir. 1995) ("We seriously question whether a New York Times article is admissible evidence of the truthfulness of its contents.").

We are of course concerned about granting a request to disqualify a federal judge when the material supporting it has not been admitted in evidence. Disqualification is never taken lightly. In the wrong hands, a disqualification motion is a procedural weapon to harass opponents and delay proceedings. If supported only by rumor, speculation, or innuendo, it is also a means to tarnish the reputation of a federal judge.

But the circumstances of this case are most unusual. By placing an embargo on the interviews, the District Judge ensured that the full extent of his actions would not be revealed until this case was on appeal. Plaintiffs, in defending the judgment, do not dispute the statements attributed to him in the press; they do not request an evidentiary hearing; and they do not argue that Microsoft should have filed a motion in the District Court before raising the matter on appeal. At oral argument, plaintiffs all but conceded that the Judge violated ethical restrictions by discussing the case in public: "On behalf of the governments, I have no brief to defend the District Judge's decision to discuss this case publicly while it was pending on appeal, and I have no brief to defend the judge's decision to discuss the case with reporters while the trial was proceeding, even given the embargo on any reporting concerning those conversations until after the trial." 02/27/01 Ct. Appeals Tr. at 326.

We must consider too that the federal disqualification provisions reflect a strong federal policy to preserve the actual and apparent impartiality of the federal judiciary. Judicial misconduct may implicate that policy regardless of the means by which it is disclosed to the public. Cf. The Washington Post v. Robinson, 935 F.2d 282, 291 (D.C. Cir.

1991) (taking judicial notice of newspaper articles to ascertain whether a fact was within public knowledge). Also, in our analysis of the arguments presented by the parties, the specifics of particular conversations are less important than their cumulative effect.

For these reasons we have decided to adjudicate Microsoft's disqualification request notwithstanding the state of the record. The same reasons also warrant a departure from our usual practice of declining to address issues raised for the first time on appeal: the "matter of what questions may be taken up and resolved for the first time on appeal is one left primarily to the discretion of the courts of appeals, to be exercised on the facts of individual cases." Singleton v. Wulff, 428 U.S. 106, 121 (1976); accord Hormel v. Helvering, 312 U.S. 552, 556-57 (1941); Nat'l Ass'n of Mfrs. v. Dep't of Labor, 159 F.3d 597, 605-06 (D.C. Cir. 1998). We will assume the truth of the press accounts and not send the case back for an evidentiary hearing on this subject. We reach no judgment on whether the details of the interviews were accurately recounted.

The published accounts indicate that the District Judge discussed numerous topics relating to the case. Among them was his distaste for the defense of technological integration—one of the central issues in the lawsuit. In September 1999, two months before his Findings of Fact and six months before his Conclusions of Law, and in remarks that were kept secret until after the Final Judgment, the Judge told reporters from the New York Times that he questioned Microsoft's integration of a web browser into Windows. Stating that he was "not a fan of integration," he drew an analogy to a 35-millimeter camera with an integrated light meter that in his view should also be offered separately: "You like the convenience of having a light meter built in, integrated, so all you have to do is press a button to get a reading. But do you think camera makers should also serve photographers who want to use a separate light meter, so they can hold it up, move it around?" JOEL BRINKLEY & STEVE LOHR, U.S. v. MICROSOFT 263 (2001). In other remarks, the Judge commented on the integration at the heart of the case: "[I]t was quite clear to me that the motive of Microsoft in bundling the Internet browser was not one of consumer convenience. The evidence that this was done for the consumer was not credible.... The evidence was so compelling that there was an ulterior motive." Wilke, WALL ST. J. As for tying law in general, he criticized this court's ruling in the consent decree case, saying it "was wrongheaded on several counts" and would exempt the software industry from the antitrust laws. BRINKLEY & LOHR, U.S. v. MICROSOFT 78, 295; Brinkley & Lohr, N.Y. TIMES.

Reports of the interviews have the District Judge describing Microsoft's conduct, with particular emphasis on what he regarded as the company's prevarication, hubris, and impenitence. In some of his secret meetings with reporters, the Judge offered his contemporaneous impressions of testimony. He permitted at least one reporter to see an entry concerning Bill Gates in his "oversized green notebook." KEN AULETTA, WORLD WAR 3.0, at 112 (2001). He also provided numerous after-the-fact credibility assessments. He told reporters that Bill Gates' "testimony is inherently without credibility" and "[i]f you can't believe this guy, who else can you believe?" BRINKLEY & LOHR, U.S. v. MICROSOFT 278; Brinkley & Lohr, N.Y. TIMES; see also Auletta, THE NEW YORKER, at 40. As for the company's other witnesses, the Judge is reported as saying that there "were times when I became impatient with Microsoft witnesses who were giving speeches." "[T]hey were telling me things I just flatly could not credit." Brinkley & Lohr, N.Y. TIMES. In an interview given the day he entered the break-up order, he summed things up: "Falsus in uno, falsus in omnibus": "Untrue in one thing, untrue in everything." "I don't subscribe to that as absolutely true. But it does lead one to suspicion. It's a universal human experience. If someone lies to you once, how much else can you credit as the truth?" Wilke, WALL ST. J.

According to reporter Auletta, the District Judge told him in private that, "I thought they [Microsoft and its executives] didn't think they were regarded as adult members of the community. I thought they would learn." AULETTA, WORLD WAR 3.0, at 14. The Judge told a college audience that "Bill Gates is an ingenious engineer, but I don't think he is that adept at business ethics. He has not yet come to realise things he did (when Microsoft was smaller) he should not have done when he became a monopoly." Spiegel, FIN. TIMES. Characterizing Gates' and his company's "crime" as hubris, the Judge stated that "[i]f I were able to propose a remedy of my devising, I'd require Mr. Gates to write a book report" on Napoleon Bonaparte, "[b]ecause I think [Gates] has a Napoleonic concept of himself and his company, an arrogance that derives from power and unalloyed success, with no leavening hard experience, no reverses." Auletta, THE NEW YORKER, at 41; see also AULETTA, WORLD WAR 3.0, at 397. The Judge apparently became, in Auletta's words, "increasingly troubled by what he learned about Bill Gates and couldn't get out of his mind the group picture he had seen of Bill Gates and Paul Allen and their shaggy-haired first employees at Microsoft." The reporter wrote that the Judge said he saw in the picture "a smart-mouthed young kid who has extraordinary ability and needs a little discipline. I've often said to colleagues that Gates would be better off if he had finished Harvard." AULETTA, WORLD WAR 3.0, at 168-69; see also Auletta, THE NEW YORKER, at 46 (reporting the District Judge's statement that "they [Microsoft and its executives] don't act like grown-ups!" "[T]o this day they continue to deny they did anything wrong.").

The District Judge likened Microsoft's writing of incriminating documents to drug traffickers who "never figure out that they shouldn't be saying certain things on the phone." BRINKLEY & LOHR, U.S. v. MICROSOFT 6; Brinkley & Lohr, N.Y. TIMES. He invoked the drug trafficker analogy again to denounce Microsoft's protestations of innocence, this time with a reference to the notorious Newton Street Crew that terrorized parts of Washington, D.C. Reporter Auletta wrote in The New Yorker that the Judge > went as far as to compare the company's declaration of innocence to the protestations of gangland killers. He was referring to five gang members in a racketeering, drug-dealing, and murder trial that he had presided over > four years earlier. In that case, the three victims had had their heads bound with duct tape before they were riddled with bullets from semi-automatic weapons. "On the day of the sentencing, the gang members maintained that they had done nothing wrong, saying that the whole case was a conspiracy by the white power structure to destroy them," Jackson recalled. "I am now under no illusions that miscreants will realize that other parts of society will view them that way."

Auletta, THE NEW YORKER, at 40-41; AULETTA, WORLD WAR 3.0, at 369-70 (same); see also Auletta, THE NEW YORKER, at 46.

The District Judge also secretly divulged to reporters his views on the remedy for Microsoft's antitrust violations. On the question whether Microsoft was entitled to any process at the remedy stage, the Judge told reporters in May 2000 that he was "not aware of any case authority that says I have to give them any due process at all. The case is over. They lost." Brinkley & Lohr, N.Y. TIMES. Another reporter has the Judge asking "[w]ere the Japanese allowed to propose terms of their surrender?" Spiegel, FIN. TIMES. The District Judge also told reporters the month before he issued his break-up order that "[a]ssuming, as I think they are, [ ] the Justice Department and the states are genuinely concerned about the public interest," "I know they have carefully studied all the possible options. This isn't a bunch of amateurs. They have consulted with some of the best minds in America over a long period of time." "I am not in a position to duplicate that and re-engineer their work. There's no way I can equip myself to do a better job than they have done." Brinkley & Lohr, N.Y. TIMES; cf. Final Judgment, at 62-63.

In February 2000, four months before his final order splitting the company in two, the District Judge reportedly told New York Times reporters that he was "not at all comfortable with restructuring the company," because he was unsure whether he was "competent to do that." Brinkley & Lohr, N.Y. TIMES; see also BRINKLEY & LOHR, U.S. v. MICROSOFT 277-78 (same); cf. AULETTA, WORLD WAR 3.0, at 370 (comment by the Judge in April 2000 that he was inclining toward behavioral rather than structural remedies). A few months later, he had a change of heart. He told the same reporters that "with what looks like Microsoft intransigence, a breakup is inevitable." Brinkley & Lohr, N.Y. TIMES; see also BRINKLEY & LOHR, U.S. v. MICROSOFT 315. The Judge recited a "North Carolina mule trainer" story to explain his change in thinking from "[i]f it ain't broken, don't try to fix it" and "I just don't think that [restructuring the company] is something I want to try to do on my own" to ordering Microsoft broken in two:

> He had a trained mule who could do all kinds of wonderful tricks. One day somebody asked him: "How do you do it? How do you train the mule to do all these amazing things?" "Well," he answered, "I'll show you." He took a 2-by-4 and whopped him upside the head. The mule was reeling and fell to his knees, and the trainer said: "You just have to get his attention."

BRINKLEY & LOHR, U.S. v. MICROSOFT 278. The Judge added: "I hope I've got Microsoft's attention." Id.; see also Grimaldi, WASH. POST (comments by the Judge blaming the break-up on Microsoft's intransigence and on what he perceived to be Microsoft's responsibility for the failure of settlement talks); Spiegel, FIN. TIMES (the Judge blaming break-up on Microsoft's intransigence).

B. Violations of the Code of Conduct for United States Judges

The Code of Conduct for United States Judges was adopted by the Judicial Conference of the United States in 1973. It prescribes ethical norms for federal judges as a means to preserve the actual and apparent integrity of the federal judiciary. Every federal judge receives a copy of the Code, the Commentary to the Code, the Advisory Opinions of the Judicial Conference's Committee on Codes of Conduct, and digests of the Committee's informal, unpublished opinions. See II GUIDE TO JUDICIARY POLICIES AND PROCEDURES (1973). The material is periodically updated. Judges who have questions about whether their conduct would be consistent with the Code may write to the Codes of Conduct Committee for a written, confidential opinion. See Introduction, CODE OF CONDUCT. The Committee traditionally responds promptly. A judge may also seek informal advice from the Committee's circuit representative.

While some of the Code's Canons frequently generate questions about their application, others are straightforward and easily understood. Canon 3A(6) is an example of the latter. In forbidding federal judges to comment publicly "on the merits of a pending or impending action," Canon 3A(6) applies to cases pending before any court, state or federal, trial or appellate. See JEFFREY M. SHAMAN ET AL., JUDICIAL CONDUCT AND ETHICS § 10.34, at 353 (3d ed. 2000). As "impending" indicates, the prohibition begins even before a case enters the court system, when there is reason to believe a case may be filed. Cf. E. WAYNE THODE, REPORTER'S NOTES TO CODE OF JUDICIAL CONDUCT 54 (1973). An action remains "pending" until "completion of the appellate process." CODE OF CONDUCT Canon 3A(6) cmt.; Comm. on Codes of Conduct, Adv. Op. No. 55 (1998).

The Microsoft case was "pending" during every one of the District Judge's meetings with reporters; the case is "pending" now; and even after our decision issues, it will remain pending for some time. The District Judge breached his ethical duty under Canon 3A(6) each time he spoke to a reporter about the merits of the case. Although the reporters interviewed him in private, his comments were public. Court was not in session and his discussion of the case took place outside the presence of the parties. He provided his views not to court personnel assisting him in the case, but to members of the public. And these were not just any members of the public. Because he was talking to reporters, the Judge knew his comments would eventually receive widespread dissemination.

It is clear that the District Judge was not discussing purely procedural matters, which are a permissible subject of public comment under one of the Canon's three narrowly drawn exceptions. He disclosed his views on the factual and legal matters at the heart of the case. His opinions about the credibility of witnesses, the validity of legal theories, the culpability of the defendant, the choice of remedy, and so forth all dealt with the merits of the action. It is no excuse that the Judge may have intended to "educate" the public about the case or to rebut "public misperceptions" purportedly caused by the parties. See Grimaldi, WASH. POST; Microsoft Judge Says He May Step down from Case on Appeal, WALL ST. J., Oct. 30, 2000. If those were his intentions, he could have addressed the factual and legal issues as he saw them—and thought the public should see them—in his Findings of Fact, Conclusions of Law, Final Judgment, or in a written opinion. Or he could have held his tongue until all appeals were concluded.

Far from mitigating his conduct, the District Judge's insistence on secrecy—his embargo—made matters worse. Concealment of the interviews suggests knowledge of their impropriety. Concealment also prevented the parties from nipping his improprieties in the bud. Without any knowledge of the interviews, neither the plaintiffs nor the defendant had a chance to object or to seek the Judge's removal before he issued his Final Judgment.

Other federal judges have been disqualified for making limited public comments about cases pending before them. See In re Boston's Children First, 244 F.3d 164 (1st Cir. 2001); In re IBM Corp., 45 F.3d 641 (2d Cir. 1995); United States v. Cooley, 1 F.3d 985 (10th Cir. 1993). Given the extent of the Judge's transgressions in this case, we have little doubt that if the parties had discovered his secret liaisons with the press, he would have been disqualified, voluntarily or by court order. Cf. In re Barry, 946 F.2d 913 (D.C. Cir. 1991) (per curiam); id. at 915 (Edwards, J., dissenting).

In addition to violating the rule prohibiting public comment, the District Judge's reported conduct raises serious questions under Canon 3A(4). That Canon states that a "judge should accord to every person who is legally interested in a proceeding, or the person's lawyer, full right to be heard according to law, and, except as authorized by law, neither initiate nor consider ex parte communications on the merits, or procedures affecting the merits, of a pending or impending proceeding." CODE OF CONDUCT Canon 3A(4).

What did the reporters convey to the District Judge during their secret sessions? By one account, the Judge spent a total of ten hours giving taped interviews to one reporter. AULETTA, WORLD WAR 3.0, at 14 n.*. We do not know whether he spent even more time in untaped conversations with the same reporter, nor do we know how much time he spent with others. But we think it safe to assume that these interviews were not monologues. Interviews often become conversations. When reporters pose questions or make assertions, they may be furnishing information, information that may reflect their personal views of the case. The published accounts indicate this happened on at least one occasion. Ken Auletta reported, for example, that he told the Judge "that Microsoft employees professed shock that he thought they had violated the law and behaved unethically," at which time the Judge became "agitated" by "Microsoft's 'obstinacy'." Id. at 369. It is clear that Auletta had views of the case. As he wrote in a Washington Post editorial, "[a]nyone who sat in [the District Judge's] courtroom during the trial had seen ample evidence of Microsoft's sometimes thuggish tactics." Ken Auletta, Maligning the Microsoft Judge, WASH. POST, Mar. 7, 2001, at A23.

The District Judge's repeated violations of Canons 3A(6) and 3A(4) also violated Canon 2, which provides that "a judge should avoid impropriety and the appearance of impropriety in all activities." CODE OF CONDUCT Canon 2; see also In re Charge of Judicial Misconduct, 47 F.3d 399, 400 (10th Cir. Jud. Council 1995) ("The allegations of extra-judicial comments cause the Council substantial concern under both Canon 3A(6) and Canon 2 of the Judicial Code of Conduct."). Canon 2A requires federal judges to "respect and comply with the law" and to "act at all times in a manner that promotes public confidence in the integrity and impartiality of the judiciary." CODE OF CONDUCT Canon 2A. The Code of Conduct is the law with respect to the ethical obligations of federal judges, and it is clear the District Judge violated it on multiple occasions in this case. The rampant disregard for the judiciary's ethical obligations that the public witnessed in this case undoubtedly jeopardizes "public confidence in the integrity" of the District Court proceedings.

Another point needs to be stressed. Rulings in this case have potentially huge financial consequences for one of the nation's largest publicly-traded companies and its investors. The District Judge's secret interviews during the trial provided a select few with inside information about the case, information that enabled them and anyone they shared it with to anticipate rulings before the Judge announced them to the world. Although he "embargoed" his comments, the Judge had no way of policing the reporters. For all he knew there may have been trading on the basis of the information he secretly conveyed. The public cannot be expected to maintain confidence in the integrity and impartiality of the federal judiciary in the face of such conduct.

C. Appearance of Partiality

The Code of Conduct contains no enforcement mechanism. See THODE, REPORTER'S NOTES TO CODE OF JUDICIAL CONDUCT 43. The Canons, including the one that requires a judge to disqualify himself in certain circumstances, see CODE OF CONDUCT Canon 3C, are self-enforcing. There are, however, remedies extrinsic to the Code. One is an internal disciplinary proceeding, begun with the filing of a complaint with the clerk of the court of appeals pursuant to 28 U.S.C. § 372(c). Another is disqualification of the offending judge under either 28 U.S.C. § 144, which requires the filing of an affidavit while the case is in the District Court, or 28 U.S.C. § 455, which does not. Microsoft urges the District Judge's disqualification under § 455(a): a judge "shall disqualify himself in any proceeding in which his impartiality might reasonably be questioned." 28 U.S.C. § 455(a). The standard for disqualification under § 455(a) is an objective one. The question is whether a reasonable and informed observer would question the judge's impartiality. See In re Barry, 946 F.2d at 914;

see also In re Aguinda, 241 F.3d 194, 201 (2d Cir. 2001); RICHARD E. FLAMM, JUDICIAL DISQUALIFICATION § 24.2.1 (1996).

"The very purpose of § 455(a) is to promote confidence in the judiciary by avoiding even the appearance of impropriety whenever possible." Liljeberg v. Health Servs. Acquisition Corp., 486 U.S. 847, 865 (1988). As such, violations of the Code of Conduct may give rise to a violation of § 455(a) if doubt is cast on the integrity of the judicial process. It has been argued that any "public comment by a judge concerning the facts, applicable law, or merits of a case that is sub judice in his court or any comment concerning the parties or their attorneys would raise grave doubts about the judge's objectivity and his willingness to reserve judgment until the close of the proceeding." William G. Ross, Extrajudicial Speech: Charting the Boundaries of Propriety, 2 GEO. J. LEGAL ETHICS 589, 598 (1989). Some courts of appeals have taken a hard line on public comments, finding violations of § 455(a) for judicial commentary on pending cases that seems mild in comparison to what we are confronting in this case. See Boston's Children First, 244 F.3d 164 (granting writ of mandamus ordering district judge to recuse herself under § 455(a) because of public comments on class certification and standing in a pending case); In re IBM Corp., 45 F.3d 641 (granting writ of mandamus ordering district judge to recuse himself based in part on the appearance of partiality caused by his giving newspaper interviews); Cooley, 1 F.3d 985 (vacating convictions and disqualifying district judge for appearance of partiality because he appeared on television program Nightline and stated that abortion protestors in a case before him were breaking the law and that his injunction would be obeyed).

While § 455(a) is concerned with actual and apparent impropriety, the statute requires disqualification only when a judge's "impartiality might reasonably be questioned." 28 U.S.C. § 455(a). Although this court has condemned public judicial comments on pending cases, we have not gone so far as to hold that every violation of Canon 3A(6) or every impropriety under the Code of Conduct inevitably destroys the appearance of impartiality and thus violates § 455(a).

See In re Barry, 946 F.2d at 914; see also Boston's Children First, 244 F.3d at 168; United States v. Fortier, 242 F.3d 1224, 1229 (10th Cir. 2001).

In this case, however, we believe the line has been crossed. The public comments were not only improper, but also would lead a reasonable, informed observer to question the District Judge's impartiality. Public confidence in the integrity and impartiality of the judiciary is seriously jeopardized when judges secretly share their thoughts about the merits of pending cases with the press. Judges who covet publicity, or convey the appearance that they do, lead any objective observer to wonder whether their judgments are being influenced by the prospect of favorable coverage in the media. Discreet and limited public comments may not compromise a judge's apparent impartiality, but we have little doubt that the District Judge's conduct had that effect. Appearance may be all there is, but that is enough to invoke the Canons and § 455(a).

Judge Learned Hand spoke of "this America of ours where the passion for publicity is a disease, and where swarms of foolish, tawdry moths dash with rapture into its consuming fire...." LEARNED HAND, THE SPIRIT OF LIBERTY 132-33 (2d ed. 1953). Judges are obligated to resist this passion. Indulging it compromises what Edmund Burke justly regarded as the "cold neutrality of an impartial judge." Cold or not, federal judges must maintain the appearance of impartiality. What was true two centuries ago is true today: "Deference to the judgments and rulings of courts depends upon public confidence in the integrity and independence of judges." CODE OF CONDUCT Canon 1 cmt. Public confidence in judicial impartiality cannot survive if judges, in disregard of their ethical obligations, pander to the press.

We recognize that it would be extraordinary to disqualify a judge for bias or appearance of partiality when his remarks arguably reflected what he learned, or what he thought he learned, during the proceedings. See Liteky v. United States, 510 U.S. 540, 554-55 (1994); United States v. Barry, 961 F.2d 260, 263 (D.C. Cir. 1992). But this "extrajudicial source" rule has no bearing on the case before us. The problem here is not just what the District Judge said, but to whom he said it and when. His crude characterizations of Microsoft, his frequent denigrations of Bill Gates, his mule trainer analogy as a reason for his remedy—all of these remarks and others might not have given rise to a violation of the Canons or of § 455(a) had he uttered them from the bench. See Liteky, 510 U.S. at 555-56; CODE OF CONDUCT Canon 3A(6) (exception to prohibition on public comments for "statements made in the course of the judge's official duties"). But then Microsoft would have had an opportunity to object, perhaps even to persuade, and the Judge would have made a record for review on appeal. It is an altogether different matter when the statements are made outside the courtroom, in private meetings unknown to the parties, in anticipation that ultimately the Judge's remarks would be reported. Rather than manifesting neutrality and impartiality, the reports of the interviews with the District Judge convey the impression of a judge posturing for posterity, trying to please the reporters with colorful analogies and observations bound to wind up in the stories they write. Members of the public may reasonably question whether the District Judge's desire for press coverage influenced his judgments, indeed whether a publicity-seeking judge might consciously or subconsciously seek the publicity-maximizing outcome. We believe, therefore, that the District Judge's interviews with reporters created an appearance that he was not acting impartially, as the Code of Conduct and § 455(a) require.

D. Remedies for Judicial Misconduct and Appearance of Partiality

1. Disqualification

Disqualification is mandatory for conduct that calls a judge's impartiality into question. See 28 U.S.C. § 455(a); In re School Asbestos Litig., 977 F.2d 764, 783 (3d Cir. 1992). Section 455 does not prescribe the scope of disqualification. Rather, Congress "delegated to the judiciary the task of fashioning the remedies that will best serve the purpose" of the disqualification statute. Liljeberg, 486 U.S. at 862.

At a minimum, § 455(a) requires prospective disqualification of the offending judge, that is, disqualification from the judge's hearing any further proceedings in the case. See United States v. Microsoft Corp., 56 F.3d 1448, 1463-65 (D.C. Cir. 1995) (per curiam) ("Microsoft I"). Microsoft urges retroactive disqualification of the District Judge, which would entail disqualification antedated to an earlier part of the proceedings and vacatur of all subsequent acts. Cf. In re School Asbestos Litig., 977 F.2d at 786 (discussing remedy options).

"There need not be a draconian remedy for every violation of § 455(a)." Liljeberg, 486 U.S. at 862. Liljeberg held that a district judge could be disqualified under § 455(a) after entering final judgment in a case, even though the judge was not (but should have been) aware of the grounds for disqualification before final judgment. The Court identified three factors relevant to the question whether vacatur is appropriate: "in determining whether a judgment should be vacated for a violation of § 455(a), it is appropriate to consider the risk of injustice to the parties in the particular case, the risk that the denial of relief will produce injustice in other cases, and the risk of undermining the public's confidence in the judicial process." Id. at 864. Although the Court was discussing § 455(a) in a slightly different context (the judgment there had become final after appeal and the movant sought to have it vacated under Rule 60(b)), we believe the test it propounded applies as well to cases such as this in which the full extent of the disqualifying circumstances came to light only while the appeal was pending. See In re School Asbestos Litig., 977 F.2d at 785.

Our application of Liljeberg leads us to conclude that the appropriate remedy for the violations of § 455(a) is disqualification of the District Judge retroactive only to the date he entered the order breaking up Microsoft. We therefore will vacate that order in its entirety and remand this case to a different District Judge, but will not set aside the existing Findings of Fact or Conclusions of Law (except insofar as specific findings are clearly erroneous or legal conclusions are incorrect).

This partially retroactive disqualification minimizes the risk of injustice to the parties and the damage to public confidence in the judicial process. Although the violations of the Code of Conduct and § 455(a) were serious, full retroactive disqualification is unnecessary. It would unduly penalize plaintiffs, who were innocent and unaware of the misconduct, and would have only slight marginal deterrent effect.

Most important, full retroactive disqualification is unnecessary to protect Microsoft's right to an impartial adjudication. The District Judge's conduct destroyed the appearance of impartiality. Microsoft neither alleged nor demonstrated that it rose to the level of actual bias or prejudice. There is no reason to presume that everything the District Judge did is suspect. See In re Allied-Signal Inc., 891 F.2d 974, 975-76 (1st Cir. 1989); cf. Liberty Lobby, Inc. v. Dow Jones & Co., 838 F.2d 1287, 1301-02 (D.C. Cir. 1988). Although Microsoft challenged very few of the findings as clearly erroneous, we have carefully reviewed the entire record and discern no basis to suppose that actual bias infected his factual findings.

The most serious judicial misconduct occurred near or during the remedial stage. It is therefore commensurate that our remedy focus on that stage of the case. The District Judge's impatience with what he viewed as intransigence on the part of the company; his refusal to allow an evidentiary hearing; his analogizing Microsoft to Japan at the end of World War II; his story about the mule—all of these out-of-court remarks and others, plus the Judge's evident efforts to please the press, would give a reasonable, informed observer cause to question his impartiality in ordering the company split in two.

To repeat, we disqualify the District Judge retroactive only to the imposition of the remedy, and thus vacate the remedy order for the reasons given in Section V and because of the appearance of partiality created by the District Judge's misconduct.

2. Review of Findings of Fact and Conclusions of Law

Given the limited scope of our disqualification of the District Judge, we have let stand for review his Findings of Fact and Conclusions of Law. The severity of the District Judge's misconduct and the appearance of partiality it created have led us to consider whether we can and should subject his factfindings to greater scrutiny. For a number of reasons we have rejected any such approach.

The Federal Rules require that district court findings of fact not be set aside unless they are clearly erroneous. See FED. R. CIV. P. 52(a). Ordinarily, there is no basis for doubting that the District Court's factual findings are entitled to the substantial deference the clearly erroneous standard entails. But of course this is no ordinary case. Deference to a district court's factfindings presumes impartiality on the lower court's part. When impartiality is called into question, how much deference is due?

The question implies that there is some middle ground, but we believe there is none. As the rules are written, district court factfindings receive either full deference under the clearly erroneous standard or they must be vacated. There is no de novo appellate review of factfindings and no intermediate level between de novo and clear error, not even for findings the court of appeals may consider sub-par. See Amadeo v. Zant, 486 U.S. 214, 228 (1988) ("The District Court's lack of precision, however, is no excuse for the Court of Appeals to ignore the dictates of Rule 52(a) and engage in impermissible appellate factfinding."); Anderson v. City of Bessemer City, 470 U.S. 564, 571-75 (1985) (criticizing district court practice of adopting a party's proposed factfindings but overturning court of appeals' application of "close scrutiny" to such findings).

Rule 52(a) mandates clearly erroneous review of all district court factfindings: "Findings of fact, whether based on oral or documentary evidence, shall not be set aside unless clearly erroneous, and due regard shall be given to the opportunity of the trial court to judge of the credibility of the witnesses." FED. R. CIV. P. 52(a). The rule "does not make exceptions or purport to exclude certain categories of factual findings from the obligation of a court of appeals to accept a district court's findings unless clearly erroneous." Pullman-Standard v. Swint, 456 U.S. 273, 287 (1982); see also Anderson, 470 U.S. at 574-75; Inwood Labs., Inc. v. Ives Labs., Inc., 456 U.S. 844, 855-58 (1982). The Supreme Court has emphasized on multiple occasions that "[i]n applying the clearly erroneous standard to the findings of a district court sitting without a jury, appellate courts must constantly have in mind that their function is not to decide factual issues de novo." Zenith Radio Corp. v. Hazeltine Research, Inc., 395 U.S. 100, 123 (1969); Anderson, 470 U.S. at 573 (quoting Zenith).

The mandatory nature of Rule 52(a) does not compel us to accept factfindings that result from the District Court's misapplication of governing law or that otherwise do not permit meaningful appellate review. See Pullman-Standard, 456 U.S. at 292; Inwood Labs., 456 U.S. at 855 n.15. Nor must we accept findings that are utterly deficient in other ways. In such a case, we vacate and remand for further factfinding. See 9 MOORE'S FEDERAL PRACTICE § 52.12[1] (Matthew Bender 3d ed. 2000); 9A CHARLES A. WRIGHT & ARTHUR R. MILLER, FEDERAL PRACTICE AND PROCEDURE § 2577, at 514-22 (2d ed. 1995); cf. Icicle Seafoods, Inc. v. Worthington, 475 U.S. 709, 714 (1986); Pullman-Standard, 456 U.S. at 291-92.

When there is fair room for argument that the District Court's factfindings should be vacated in toto, the court of appeals should be especially careful in determining that the findings are worthy of the deference Rule 52(a) prescribes. See, e.g., Thermo Electron Corp. v. Schiavone Constr. Co., 915 F.2d 770, 773 (1st Cir. 1990); cf. Bose Corp. v. Consumers Union of United States, Inc., 466 U.S. 485, 499 (1984). Thus, although Microsoft alleged only appearance of bias, not actual bias, we have reviewed the record with painstaking care and have discerned no evidence of actual bias. See S. Pac. Communications Co. v. AT & T, 740 F.2d 980, 984 (D.C. Cir. 1984); Cooley, 1 F.3d at 996 (disqualifying district judge for appearance of partiality but noting that "the record of the proceedings below ... discloses no bias").

In light of this conclusion, the District Judge's factual findings both warrant deference under the clear error standard of review and, though exceedingly sparing in citations to the record, permit meaningful appellate review. In reaching these conclusions, we have not ignored the District Judge's reported intention to craft his factfindings and Conclusions of Law to minimize the breadth of our review. The Judge reportedly told Ken Auletta that "[w]hat I want to do is confront the Court of Appeals with an established factual record which is a fait accompli." AULETTA, WORLD WAR 3.0, at 230. He explained: "part of the inspiration for doing that is that I take mild offense at their reversal of my preliminary injunction in the consent-decree case, where they went ahead and made up about ninety percent of the facts on their own." Id. Whether the District Judge takes offense, mild or severe, is beside the point. Appellate decisions command compliance, not agreement. We do not view the District Judge's remarks as anything other than his expression of disagreement with this court's decision, and his desire to provide extensive factual findings in this case, which he did.

VII. CONCLUSION

The judgment of the District Court is affirmed in part, reversed in part, and remanded in part. We vacate in full the Final Judgment embodying the remedial order, and remand the case to the District Court for reassignment to a different trial judge for further proceedings consistent with this opinion.

Before: EDWARDS, Chief Judge, WILLIAMS, GINSBURG, SENTELLE, RANDOLPH, ROGERS and TATEL, Circuit Judges.

Opinion for the Court filed Per Curiam.

Per Curiam: Microsoft Corporation appeals from judgments of the District Court finding the company in violation of §§ 1 and 2 of the Sherman Act and ordering various remedies.

The action against Microsoft arose pursuant to a complaint filed by the United States and separate complaints filed by individual States. The District Court determined that Microsoft had maintained a monopoly in the market for Intel-compatible PC operating systems in violation of § 2; attempted to gain a monopoly in the market for internet browsers in violation of § 2; and illegally tied two purportedly separate products, Windows and Internet Explorer ("IE"), in violation of § 1. United States v. Microsoft Corp., 87 F. Supp. 2d 30 (D.D.C. 2000) ("Conclusions of Law"). The District Court then found that the same facts that established liability under §§ 1 and 2 of the Sherman Act mandated findings of liability under analogous state law antitrust provisions. Id. To remedy the Sherman Act violations, the District Court issued a Final Judgment requiring Microsoft to submit a proposed plan of divestiture, with the company to be split into an operating systems business and an applications business. United States v. Microsoft Corp., 97 F. Supp. 2d 59, 64-65 (D.D.C. 2000) ("Final Judgment"). The District Court's remedial order also contains a number of interim restrictions on Microsoft's conduct. Id. at 66-69.

Microsoft's appeal contests both the legal conclusions and the resulting remedial order. There are three principal aspects of this appeal. First, Microsoft challenges the District Court's legal conclusions as to all three alleged antitrust violations and also a number of the procedural and factual foundations on which they rest. Second, Microsoft argues that the remedial order must be set aside, because the District Court failed to afford the company an evidentiary hearing on disputed facts and, also, because the substantive provisions of the order are flawed. Finally, Microsoft asserts that the trial judge committed ethical violations by engaging in impermissible ex parte contacts and making inappropriate public comments on the merits of the case while it was pending. Microsoft argues that these ethical violations compromised the District Judge's appearance of impartiality, thereby necessitating his disqualification and vacatur of his Findings of Fact, Conclusions of Law, and Final Judgment.

After carefully considering the voluminous record on appeal—including the District Court's Findings of Fact and Conclusions of Law, the testimony and exhibits submitted at trial, the parties' briefs, and the oral arguments before this court—we find that some but not all of Microsoft's liability challenges have merit. Accordingly, we affirm in part and reverse in part the District Court's judgment that Microsoft violated § 2 of the Sherman Act by employing anticompetitive means to maintain a monopoly in the operating system market; we reverse the District Court's determination that Microsoft violated § 2 of the Sherman Act by illegally attempting to monopolize the internet browser market; and we remand the District Court's finding that Microsoft violated § 1 of the Sherman Act by unlawfully tying its browser to its operating system. Our judgment extends to the District Court's findings with respect to the state law counterparts of the plaintiffs' Sherman Act claims.

We also find merit in Microsoft's challenge to the Final Judgment embracing the District Court's remedial order. There are several reasons supporting this conclusion. First, the District Court's Final Judgment rests on a number of liability determinations that do not survive appellate review; therefore, the remedial order as currently fashioned cannot stand. Furthermore, we would vacate and remand the remedial order even were we to uphold the District Court's liability determinations in their entirety, because the District Court failed to hold an evidentiary hearing to address remedies-specific factual disputes.

Finally, we vacate the Final Judgment on remedies, because the trial judge engaged in impermissible ex parte contacts by holding secret interviews with members of the media and made numerous offensive comments about Microsoft officials in public statements outside of the courtroom, giving rise to an appearance of partiality. Although we find no evidence of actual bias, we hold that the actions of the trial judge seriously tainted the proceedings before the District Court and called into question the integrity of the judicial process. We are therefore constrained to vacate the Final Judgment on remedies, remand the case for reconsideration of the remedial order, and require that the case be assigned to a different trial judge on remand. We believe that this disposition will be adequate to cure the cited improprieties.

In sum, for reasons more fully explained below, we affirm in part, reverse in part, and remand in part the District Court's judgment assessing liability. We vacate in full the Final Judgment embodying the remedial order and remand the case to a different trial judge for further proceedings consistent with this opinion.

I. INTRODUCTION

A. Background

In July 1994, officials at the Department of Justice ("DOJ"), on behalf of the United States, filed suit against Microsoft, charging the company with, among other things, unlawfully maintaining a monopoly in the operating system market through anticompetitive terms in its licensing and software developer agreements. The parties subsequently entered into a consent decree, thus avoiding a trial on the merits. See United States v. Microsoft Corp., 56 F.3d 1448 (D.C. Cir. 1995) ("Microsoft I"). Three years later, the Justice Department filed a civil contempt action against Microsoft for allegedly violating one of the decree's provisions. On appeal from a grant of a preliminary injunction, this court held that Microsoft's technological bundling of IE 3.0 and 4.0 with Windows 95 did not violate the relevant provision of the consent decree. United States v. Microsoft Corp., 147 F.3d 935 (D.C. Cir. 1998) ("Microsoft II"). We expressly reserved the question whether such bundling might independently violate §§ 1 or 2 of the Sherman Act. Id. at 950 n.14.

On May 18, 1998, shortly before issuance of the Microsoft II decision, the United States and a group of State plaintiffs filed separate (and soon thereafter consolidated) complaints, asserting antitrust violations by Microsoft and seeking preliminary and permanent injunctions against the company's allegedly unlawful conduct. The complaints also sought any "other preliminary and permanent relief as is necessary and appropriate to restore competitive conditions in the markets affected by Microsoft's unlawful conduct." Gov't's Compl. at 53, United States v. Microsoft Corp., No. 98-1232 (D.D.C. 1999). Relying almost exclusively on Microsoft's varied efforts to unseat Netscape Navigator as the preeminent internet browser, plaintiffs charged four distinct violations of the Sherman Act: (1) unlawful exclusive dealing arrangements in violation of § 1; (2) unlawful tying of IE to Windows 95 and Windows 98 in violation of § 1; (3) unlawful maintenance of a monopoly in the PC operating system market in violation of § 2; and (4) unlawful attempted monopolization of the internet browser market in violation of § 2. The States also brought pendent claims charging Microsoft with violations of various State antitrust laws.

The District Court scheduled the case on a "fast track." The hearing on the preliminary injunction and the trial on the merits were consolidated pursuant to FED. R. CIV. P. 65(a)(2). The trial was then scheduled to commence on September 8, 1998, less than four months after the complaints had been filed. In a series of pretrial orders, the District Court limited each side to a maximum of 12 trial witnesses plus two rebuttal witnesses. It required that all trial witnesses' direct testimony be submitted to the court in the form of written declarations. The District Court also made allowances for the use of deposition testimony at trial to prove subordinate or predicate issues. Following the grant of three brief continuances, the trial started on October 19, 1998.

After a 76-day bench trial, the District Court issued its Findings of Fact. United States v. Microsoft Corp., 84 F. Supp. 2d 9 (D.D.C. 1999) ("Findings of Fact"). This triggered two independent courses of action. First, the District Court established a schedule for briefing on possible legal conclusions, inviting Professor Lawrence Lessig to participate as amicus curiae. Second, the District Court referred the case to mediation to afford the parties an opportunity to settle their differences. The Honorable Richard A. Posner, Chief Judge of the United States Court of Appeals for the Seventh Circuit, was appointed to serve as mediator. The parties concurred in the referral to mediation and in the choice of mediator.

Mediation failed after nearly four months of settlement talks between the parties. On April 3, 2000, with the parties' briefs having been submitted and considered, the District Court issued its conclusions of law. The District Court found Microsoft liable on the § 1 tying and § 2 monopoly maintenance and attempted monopolization claims, Conclusions of Law, at 35-51, while ruling that there was insufficient evidence to support a § 1 exclusive dealing violation, id. at 51-54. As to the pendent State actions, the District Court found the State antitrust laws conterminous with §§ 1 and 2 of the Sherman Act, thereby obviating the need for further State-specific analysis. Id. at 54-56. In those few cases where a State's law required an additional showing of intrastate impact on competition, the District Court found the requirement easily satisfied on the evidence at hand. Id. at 55.

Having found Microsoft liable on all but one count, the District Court then asked plaintiffs to submit a proposed remedy. Plaintiffs' proposal for a remedial order was subsequently filed within four weeks, along with six supplemental declarations and over 50 new exhibits. In their proposal, plaintiffs sought specific conduct remedies, plus structural relief that would split Microsoft into an applications company and an operating systems company. The District Court rejected Microsoft's request for further evidentiary proceedings and, following a single hearing on the merits of the remedy question, issued its Final Judgment on June 7, 2000. The District Court adopted plaintiffs' proposed remedy without substantive change.

Microsoft filed a notice of appeal within a week after the District Court issued its Final Judgment. This court then ordered that any proceedings before it be heard by the court sitting en banc. Before any substantive matters were addressed by this court, however, the District Court certified appeal of the case brought by the United States directly to the Supreme Court pursuant to 15 U.S.C. § 29(b), while staying the final judgment order in the federal and state cases pending appeal. The States thereafter petitioned the Supreme Court for a writ of certiorari in their case. The Supreme Court declined to hear the appeal of the Government's case and remanded the matter to this court; the Court likewise denied the States' petition for writ of certiorari. Microsoft Corp. v. United States, 530 U.S. 1301 (2000). This consolidated appeal followed.

B. Overview

Before turning to the merits of Microsoft's various arguments, we pause to reflect briefly on two matters of note, one practical and one theoretical.

The practical matter relates to the temporal dimension of this case. The litigation timeline in this case is hardly problematic. Indeed, it is noteworthy that a case of this magnitude and complexity has proceeded from the filing of complaints through trial to appellate decision in a mere three years. See, e.g., Data Gen. Corp. v. Grumman Sys. Support Corp., 36 F.3d 1147, 1155 (1st Cir. 1994) (six years from filing of complaint to appellate decision); Transamerica Computer Co., Inc. v. IBM, 698 F.2d 1377, 1381 (9th Cir. 1983) (over four years from start of trial to appellate decision); United States v. United Shoe Mach. Corp., 110 F. Supp. 295, 298 (D. Mass. 1953) (over five years from filing of complaint to trial court decision).

What is somewhat problematic, however, is that just over six years have passed since Microsoft engaged in the first conduct plaintiffs allege to be anticompetitive. As the record in this case indicates, six years seems like an eternity in the computer industry. By the time a court can assess liability, firms, products, and the marketplace are likely to have changed dramatically. This, in turn, threatens enormous practical difficulties for courts considering the appropriate measure of relief in equitable enforcement actions, both in crafting injunctive remedies in the first instance and reviewing those remedies in the second. Conduct remedies may be unavailing in such cases, because innovation to a large degree has already rendered the anticompetitive conduct obsolete (although by no means harmless). And broader structural remedies present their own set of problems, including how a court goes about restoring competition to a dramatically changed, and constantly changing, marketplace. That is just one reason why we find the District Court's refusal in the present case to hold an evidentiary hearing on remedies—to update and flesh out the available information before seriously entertaining the possibility of dramatic structural relief—so problematic. See infra Section V.

We do not mean to say that enforcement actions will no longer play an important role in curbing infringements of the antitrust laws in technologically dynamic markets, nor do we assume this in assessing the merits of this case. Even in those cases where forward-looking remedies appear limited, the Government will continue to have an interest in defining the contours of the antitrust laws so that law-abiding firms will have a clear sense of what is permissible and what is not. And the threat of private damage actions will remain to deter those firms inclined to test the limits of the law.

The second matter of note is more theoretical in nature. We decide this case against a backdrop of significant debate amongst academics and practitioners over the extent to which "old economy" § 2 monopolization doctrines should apply to firms competing in dynamic technological markets characterized by network effects. In markets characterized by network effects, one product or standard tends towards dominance, because "the utility that a user derives from consumption of the good increases with the number of other agents consuming the good." Michael L. Katz & Carl Shapiro, Network Externalities, Competition, and Compatibility, 75 AM. ECON. REV. 424, 424 (1985). For example, "[a]n individual consumer's demand to use (and hence her benefit from) the telephone network ... increases with the number of other users on the network whom she can call or from whom she can receive calls." Howard A. Shelanski & J. Gregory Sidak, Antitrust Divestiture in Network Industries, 68 U. CHI. L. REV. 1, 8 (2001). Once a product or standard achieves wide acceptance, it becomes more or less entrenched. Competition in such industries is "for the field" rather than "within the field." See Harold Demsetz, Why Regulate Utilities?, 11 J.L. & ECON. 55, 57 & n.7 (1968) (emphasis omitted).

In technologically dynamic markets, however, such entrenchment may be temporary, because innovation may alter the field altogether. See JOSEPH A. SCHUMPETER, CAPITALISM, SOCIALISM AND DEMOCRACY 81-90 (Harper Perennial 1976) (1942). Rapid technological change leads to markets in which "firms compete through innovation for temporary market dominance, from which they may be displaced by the next wave of product advancements." Shelanski & Sidak, at 11-12 (discussing Schumpeterian competition, which proceeds "sequentially over time rather than simultaneously across a market"). Microsoft argues that the operating system market is just such a market.

Whether or not Microsoft's characterization of the operating system market is correct does not appreciably alter our mission in assessing the alleged antitrust violations in the present case. As an initial matter, we note that there is no consensus among commentators on the question of whether, and to what extent, current monopolization doctrine should be amended to account for competition in technologically dynamic markets characterized by network effects. Compare Steven C. Salop & R. Craig Romaine, Preserving Monopoly: Economic Analysis, Legal Standards, and Microsoft, 7 GEO. MASON L. REV. 617, 654-55, 663-64 (1999) (arguing that exclusionary conduct in high-tech networked industries deserves heightened antitrust scrutiny in part because it may threaten to deter innovation), with Ronald A. Cass & Keith N. Hylton, Preserving Competition: Economic Analysis, Legal Standards and Microsoft, 8 GEO. MASON L. REV. 1, 36-39 (1999) (equivocating on the antitrust implications of network effects and noting that the presence of network externalities may actually encourage innovation by guaranteeing more durable monopolies to innovating winners). Indeed, there is some suggestion that the economic consequences of network effects and technological dynamism act to offset one another, thereby making it difficult to formulate categorical antitrust rules absent a particularized analysis of a given market. See Shelanski & Sidak, at 6-7 ("High profit margins might appear to be the benign and necessary recovery of legitimate investment returns in a Schumpeterian framework, but they might represent exploitation of customer lock-in and monopoly power when viewed through the lens of network economics.... The issue is particularly complex because, in network industries characterized by rapid innovation, both forces may be operating and can be difficult to isolate.").

Moreover, it should be clear that Microsoft makes no claim that anticompetitive conduct should be assessed differently in technologically dynamic markets. It claims only that the measure of monopoly power should be different. For reasons fully discussed below, we reject Microsoft's monopoly power argument. See infra Section II.A.

With this backdrop in mind, we turn to the specific challenges raised in Microsoft's appeal.

II. MONOPOLIZATION

Section 2 of the Sherman Act makes it unlawful for a firm to "monopolize." 15 U.S.C. § 2. The offense of monopolization has two elements: "(1) the possession of monopoly power in the relevant market and (2) the willful acquisition or maintenance of that power as distinguished from growth or development as a consequence of a superior product, business acumen, or historic accident." United States v. Grinnell Corp., 384 U.S. 563, 570-71 (1966). The District Court applied this test and found that Microsoft possesses monopoly power in the market for Intel-compatible PC operating systems. Focusing primarily on Microsoft's efforts to suppress Netscape Navigator's threat to its operating system monopoly, the court also found that Microsoft maintained its power not through competition on the merits, but through unlawful means. Microsoft challenges both conclusions. We defer to the District Court's findings of fact, setting them aside only if clearly erroneous. FED R. CIV. P. 52(a). We review legal questions de novo. United States ex rel. Modern Elec., Inc. v. Ideal Elec. Sec. Co., 81 F.3d 240, 244 (D.C. Cir. 1996).

We begin by considering whether Microsoft possesses monopoly power, see infra Section II.A, and finding that it does, we turn to the question whether it maintained this power through anticompetitive means. Agreeing with the District Court that the company behaved anticompetitively, see infra Section II.B, and that these actions contributed to the maintenance of its monopoly power, see infra Section II.C, we affirm the court's finding of liability for monopolization.

A. Monopoly Power

While merely possessing monopoly power is not itself an antitrust violation, see Northeastern Tel. Co. v. AT & T, 651 F.2d 76, 84-85 (2d Cir. 1981), it is a necessary element of a monopolization charge, see Grinnell, 384 U.S. at 570. The Supreme Court defines monopoly power as "the power to control prices or exclude competition." United States v. E.I. du Pont de Nemours & Co., 351 U.S. 377, 391 (1956). More precisely, a firm is a monopolist if it can profitably raise prices substantially above the competitive level. 2A PHILLIP E. AREEDA ET AL., ANTITRUST LAW ¶ 501, at 85 (1995); cf. Ball Mem'l Hosp., Inc. v. Mut. Hosp. Ins., Inc., 784 F.2d 1325, 1335 (7th Cir. 1986) (defining market power as "the ability to cut back the market's total output and so raise price"). Where evidence indicates that a firm has in fact profitably done so, the existence of monopoly power is clear. See Rebel Oil Co. v. Atl. Richfield Co., 51 F.3d 1421, 1434 (9th Cir. 1995); see also FTC v. Indiana Fed'n of Dentists, 476 U.S. 447, 460-61 (1986) (using direct proof to show market power in Sherman Act § 1 unreasonable restraint of trade action). Because such direct proof is only rarely available, courts more typically examine market structure in search of circumstantial evidence of monopoly power. 2A AREEDA ET AL., ANTITRUST LAW ¶ 531a, at 156; see also, e.g., Grinnell, 384 U.S. at 571. Under this structural approach, monopoly power may be inferred from a firm's possession of a dominant share of a relevant market that is protected by entry barriers. See

REV_00128349

Rebel Oil, 51 F.3d at 1434. "Entry barriers" are factors (such as certain regulatory requirements) that prevent new rivals from timely responding to an increase in price above the competitive level. See S. Pac. Communications Co. v. AT & T, 740 F.2d 980, 1001-02 (D.C. Cir. 1984).

The District Court considered these structural factors and concluded that Microsoft possesses monopoly power in a relevant market. Defining the market as Intel-compatible PC operating systems, the District Court found that Microsoft has a greater than 95% share. It also found the company's market position protected by a substantial entry barrier. Conclusions of Law, at 36.

Microsoft argues that the District Court incorrectly defined the relevant market. It also claims that there is no barrier to entry in that market. Alternatively, Microsoft argues that because the software industry is uniquely dynamic, direct proof, rather than circumstantial evidence, more appropriately indicates whether it possesses monopoly power. Rejecting each argument, we uphold the District Court's finding of monopoly power in its entirety.

1. Market Structure

a. Market definition

"Because the ability of consumers to turn to other suppliers restrains a firm from raising prices above the competitive level," Rothery Storage & Van Co. v. Atlas Van Lines, Inc., 792 F.2d 210, 218 (D.C. Cir. 1986), the relevant market must include all products "reasonably interchangeable by consumers for the same purposes." du Pont, 351 U.S. at 395. In this case, the District Court defined the market as "the licensing of all Intel-compatible PC operating systems worldwide," finding that there are "currently no products—and ... there are not likely to be any in the near future—that a significant percentage of computer users worldwide could substitute for [these operating systems] without incurring substantial costs." Conclusions of Law, at 36. Calling this market definition "far too narrow," Appellant's Opening Br. at 84, Microsoft argues that the District Court improperly

excluded three types of products: non-Intel compatible operating systems (primarily Apple's Macintosh operating system, Mac OS), operating systems for non-PC devices (such as handheld computers and portal websites), and "middleware" products, which are not operating systems at all.

We begin with Mac OS. Microsoft's argument that Mac OS should have been included in the relevant market suffers from a flaw that infects many of the company's monopoly power claims: the company fails to challenge the District Court's factual findings, or to argue that these findings do not support the court's conclusions. The District Court found that consumers would not switch from Windows to Mac OS in response to a substantial price increase because of the costs of acquiring the new hardware needed to run Mac OS (an Apple computer and peripherals) and compatible software applications, as well as because of the effort involved in learning the new system and transferring files to its format. Findings of Fact ¶ 20. The court also found the Apple system less appealing to consumers because it costs considerably more and supports fewer applications. Id. ¶ 21. Microsoft responds only by saying: "the district court's market definition is so narrow that it excludes Apple's Mac OS, which has competed with Windows for years, simply because the Mac OS runs on a different microprocessor." Appellant's Opening Br. at 84. This general, conclusory statement falls far short of what is required to challenge findings as clearly erroneous. Pendleton v. Rumsfeld, 628 F.2d 102, 106 (D.C. Cir. 1980); see also Terry v. Reno, 101 F.3d 1412, 1415 (D.C. Cir. 1996) (holding that claims made but not argued in a brief are waived). Microsoft neither points to evidence contradicting the District Court's findings nor alleges that supporting record evidence is insufficient. And since Microsoft does not argue that even if we accept these findings, they do not support the District Court's conclusion, we have no basis for upsetting the court's decision to exclude Mac OS from the relevant market.

Microsoft's challenge to the District Court's exclusion of non-PC based competitors, such as information appliances (handheld devices, etc.) and portal websites that host server-based software applications, suffers from the same defect:

the company fails to challenge the District Court's key factual findings. In particular, the District Court found that because information appliances fall far short of performing all of the functions of a PC, most consumers will buy them only as a supplement to their PCs. Findings of Fact ¶ 23. The District Court also found that portal websites do not presently host enough applications to induce consumers to switch, nor are they likely to do so in the near future. Id. ¶ 27. Again, because Microsoft does not argue that the District Court's findings do not support its conclusion that information appliances and portal websites are outside the relevant market, we adhere to that conclusion.

This brings us to Microsoft's main challenge to the District Court's market definition: the exclusion of middleware. Because of the importance of middleware to this case, we pause to explain what it is and how it relates to the issue before us.

Operating systems perform many functions, including allocating computer memory and controlling peripherals such as printers and keyboards. See Direct Testimony of Frederick Warren-Boulton ¶ 20, reprinted in 5 J.A. at 3172-73. Operating systems also function as platforms for software applications. They do this by "exposing"—i.e., making available to software developers—routines or protocols that perform certain widely-used functions. These are known as Application Programming Interfaces, or "APIs." See Direct Testimony of James Barksdale ¶ 70, reprinted in 5 J.A. at 2895-96. For example, Windows contains an API that enables users to draw a box on the screen. See Direct Testimony of Michael T. Devlin ¶ 12, reprinted in 5 J.A. at 3525. Software developers wishing to include that function in an application need not duplicate it in their own code. Instead, they can "call"—i.e., use—the Windows API. See Direct Testimony of James Barksdale ¶ ¶ 70-71, reprinted in 5 J.A. at 2895-97. Windows contains thousands of APIs, controlling everything from data storage to font display. See Direct Testimony of Michael Devlin ¶ 12, reprinted in 5 J.A. at 3525.

Every operating system has different APIs. Accordingly, a developer who writes an application for one operating system and wishes to sell the application to users of another must modify, or "port," the application to the second operating system. Findings of Fact ¶ 4. This process is both time-consuming and expensive. Id. ¶ 30.

"Middleware" refers to software products that expose their own APIs. Id. ¶ 28; Direct Testimony of Paul Maritz ¶ ¶ 234-36, reprinted in 6 J.A. at 3727-29. Because of this, a middleware product written for Windows could take over some or all of Windows's valuable platform functions—that is, developers might begin to rely upon APIs exposed by the middleware for basic routines rather than relying upon the API set included in Windows. If middleware were written for multiple operating systems, its impact could be even greater. The more developers could rely upon APIs exposed by such middleware, the less expensive porting to different operating systems would be. Ultimately, if developers could write applications relying exclusively on APIs exposed by middleware, their applications would run on any operating system on which the middleware was also present. See Direct Testimony of Avadis Tevanian, Jr. ¶ 45, reprinted in 5 J.A. at 3113. Netscape Navigator and Java—both at issue in this case—are middleware products written for multiple operating systems. Findings of Fact ¶ 28.

Microsoft argues that, because middleware could usurp the operating system's platform function and might eventually take over other operating system functions (for instance, by controlling peripherals), the District Court erred in excluding Navigator and Java from the relevant market. The District Court found, however, that neither Navigator, Java, nor any other middleware product could now, or would soon, expose enough APIs to serve as a platform for popular applications, much less take over all operating system functions. Id. ¶ ¶ 28-29. Again, Microsoft fails to challenge these findings, instead simply asserting middleware's "potential" as a competitor. Appellant's Opening Br. at 86. The test of reasonable interchangeability, however, required the District Court to consider only substitutes that constrain pricing in the reasonably foreseeable future, and only products that can enter the market in a relatively short time can perform this function. See Rothery, 792 F.2d at 218 ("Because the ability of consumers to turn to other suppliers restrains a firm from raising prices above the competitive level, the definition of the 'relevant market' rests on a determination of available substitutes."); see also Findings of Fact ¶ 29 ("[I]t would take several years for middleware ... to evolve" into a product that can constrain operating system pricing.). Whatever middleware's ultimate potential, the District Court found that consumers could not now abandon their operating systems and switch to middleware in response to a sustained price for Windows above the competative level. Findings of Fact ¶ ¶ 28, 29. Nor is middleware likely to overtake the operating system as the primary platform for software development any time in the near future. Id.

Alternatively, Microsoft argues that the District Court should not have excluded middleware from the relevant market because the primary focus of the plaintiffs' § 2 charge is on Microsoft's attempts to suppress middleware's threat to its operating system monopoly. According to Microsoft, it is "contradict[ory]," 2/26/2001 Ct. Appeals Tr. at 20, to define the relevant market to exclude the "very competitive threats that gave rise" to the action. Appellant's Opening Br. at 84. The purported contradiction lies between plaintiffs' § 2 theory, under which Microsoft preserved its monopoly against middleware technologies that threatened to become viable substitutes for Windows, and its theory of the relevant market, under which middleware is not presently a viable substitute for Windows. Because middleware's threat is only nascent, however, no contradiction exists. Nothing in § 2 of the Sherman Act limits its prohibition to actions taken against threats that are already well-developed enough to serve as present substitutes. See infra Section II.C. Because market definition is meant to identify products "reasonably interchangeable by consumers," du Pont, 351 U.S. at 395, and because middleware is not now interchangeable with Windows, the District Court had good reason for excluding middleware from the relevant market.

b. Market power

Having thus properly defined the relevant market, the District Court found that Windows accounts for a greater than 95% share. Findings of Fact ¶ 35. The court also found that even if Mac OS were included, Microsoft's share would exceed 80%. Id. Microsoft challenges neither finding, nor does it argue that such a market share is not predominant. Cf. Grinnell, 384 U.S. at 571 (87% is predominant); Eastman Kodak Co. v. Image Technical Servs., Inc., 504 U.S. 451, 481 (1992) (80%); du Pont, 351 U.S. at 379, 391 (75%).

Instead, Microsoft claims that even a predominant market share does not by itself indicate monopoly power. Although the "existence of [monopoly] power ordinarily may be inferred from the predominant share of the market," Grinnell, 384 U.S. at 571, we agree with Microsoft that because of the possibility of competition from new entrants, see Ball Mem'l Hosp., Inc., 784 F.2d at 1336, looking to current market share alone can be "misleading." Hunt-Wesson Foods, Inc. v. Ragu Foods, Inc., 627 F.2d 919, 924 (9th Cir. 1980); see also Ball Mem'l Hosp., Inc., 784 F.2d at 1336 ("Market share reflects current sales, but today's sales do not always indicate power over sales and price tomorrow.") In this case, however, the District Court was not misled. Considering the possibility of new rivals, the court focused not only on Microsoft's present market share, but also on the structural barrier that protects the company's future position. Conclusions of Law, at 36. That barrier—the "applications barrier to entry"—stems from two characteristics of the software market: (1) most consumers prefer operating systems for which a large number of applications have already been written; and (2) most developers prefer to write for operating systems that already have a substantial consumer base. See Findings of Fact ¶ ¶ 30, 36. This "chicken-and-egg" situation ensures that applications will continue to be written for the already dominant Windows, which in turn ensures that consumers will continue to prefer it over other operating systems. Id.

Challenging the existence of the applications barrier to entry, Microsoft observes that software developers do write applications for other operating systems, pointing out that at its peak IBM's OS/2 supported approximately 2,500 applications. Id. ¶ 46. This misses the point. That some developers write applications for other operating systems is not at all inconsistent with the finding that the applications barrier to entry discourages many from writing for these less popular platforms. Indeed, the District Court found that IBM's difficulty in attracting a larger number of software developers to write for its platform seriously impeded OS/2's success. Id. ¶ 46.

Microsoft does not dispute that Windows supports many more applications than any other operating system. It argues instead that "[i]t defies common sense" to suggest that an operating system must support as many applications as Windows does (more than 70,000, according to the District Court, id. ¶ 40) to be competitive. Appellant's Opening Br. at 96. Consumers, Microsoft points out, can only use a very small percentage of these applications. Id. As the District Court explained, however, the applications barrier to entry gives consumers reason to prefer the dominant operating system even if they have no need to use all applications written for it:

> The consumer wants an operating system that runs not only types of applications that he knows he will want to use, but also those types in which he might develop an interest later. Also, the consumer knows that if he chooses an operating system with enough demand to support multiple applications in each product category, he will be less likely to find himself straitened later by having to use an application whose features disappoint him. Finally, the average user knows that, generally speaking, applications improve through successive versions. He thus wants an operating system for which successive generations of his favorite applications will be released—promptly at that. The fact that a vastly larger number of applications are written for Windows than for other PC operating systems attracts consumers to Windows, because it reassures them that their interests will be met as long as they use Microsoft's product.

Findings of Fact ¶ 37. Thus, despite the limited success of its rivals, Microsoft benefits from the applications barrier to entry.

Of course, were middleware to succeed, it would erode the applications barrier to entry. Because applications written for multiple operating systems could run on any operating system on which the middleware product was present with little, if any, porting, the operating system market would become competitive. Id. ¶ ¶ 29, 72. But as the District Court found, middleware will not expose a sufficient number of APIs to erode the applications barrier to entry in the foreseeable future. See id. ¶ ¶ 28-29.

Microsoft next argues that the applications barrier to entry is not an entry barrier at all, but a reflection of Windows' popularity. It is certainly true that Windows may have gained its initial dominance in the operating system market competitively—through superior foresight or quality. But this case is not about Microsoft's initial acquisition of monopoly power. It is about Microsoft's efforts to maintain this position through means other than competition on the merits. Because the applications barrier to entry protects a dominant operating system irrespective of quality, it gives Microsoft power to stave off even superior new rivals. The barrier is thus a characteristic of the operating system market, not of Microsoft's popularity, or, as asserted by a Microsoft witness, the company's efficiency. See Direct Testimony of Richard Schmalensee ¶ 115, reprinted in 25 J.A. at 16153-14.

Finally, Microsoft argues that the District Court should not have considered the applications barrier to entry because it reflects not a cost borne disproportionately by new entrants, but one borne by all participants in the operating system market. According to Microsoft, it had to make major investments to convince software developers to write for its new operating system, and it continues to "evangelize" the Windows platform today. Whether costs borne by all market participants should be considered entry barriers is the subject of much debate. Compare 2A AREEDA & HOVENKAMP, ANTITRUST LAW § 420c, at 61 (arguing that these costs are entry barriers), and JOE S. BAIN, BARRIERS TO NEW COMPETITION: THEIR CHARACTER AND CONSEQUENCES IN MANUFACTURING INDUSTRIES 6-7 (1956) (considering these costs entry barriers), with L.A. Land Co. v. Brunswick Corp., 6 F.3d 1422, 1428 (9th Cir. 1993) (evaluating cost based on "[t]he disadvantage of new entrants as compared to incumbents"), and GEORGE STIGLER, THE ORGANIZATION OF INDUSTRY 67 (1968) (excluding these costs). We need not resolve this issue, however, for even under the more narrow definition it is clear that there are barriers. When Microsoft entered the operating system market with MS-DOS and the first version of Windows, it did not confront a dominant rival operating system with as massive an installed base and as vast an existing array of applications as the Windows operating systems have since enjoyed. Findings of Fact ¶ ¶ 6, 7, 43. Moreover, when Microsoft introduced Windows 95 and 98, it was able to bypass the applications barrier to entry that protected the incumbent Windows by including APIs from the earlier version in the new operating systems. See id. ¶ 44. This made porting existing Windows applications to the new version of Windows much less costly than porting them to the operating systems of other entrants who could not freely include APIs from the incumbent Windows with their own.

2. Direct Proof

Having sustained the District Court's conclusion that circumstantial evidence proves that Microsoft possesses monopoly power, we turn to Microsoft's alternative argument that it does not behave like a monopolist. Claiming that software competition is uniquely "dynamic," Appellant's Opening Br. at 84 (quoting Findings of Fact ¶ 59), the company suggests a new rule: that monopoly power in the software industry should be proven directly, that is, by examining a company's actual behavior to determine if it reveals the existence of monopoly power. According to Microsoft, not only does no such proof of its power exist, but record evidence demonstrates the absence of monopoly power. The company claims that it invests heavily in research and development, id. at 88-89 (citing Direct Testimony of Paul Maritz ¶ 155, reprinted in 6 J.A. at 3698 (testifying that Microsoft invests approximately 17% of its revenue in R&D)), and charges a low price for Windows (a small percentage of the price of an Intel-compatible PC system and less than the price of its rivals, id. at 90 (citing Findings of Fact ¶ ¶ 19, 21, 46)).

Microsoft's argument fails because, even assuming that the software market is uniquely dynamic in the long term, the District Court correctly applied the structural approach to determine if the company faces competition in the short term.

Structural market power analyses are meant to determine whether potential substitutes constrain a firm's ability to raise prices above the competitive level; only threats that are likely to materialize in the relatively near future perform this function to any significant degree. Rothery, 792 F.2d at 218 (quoting LAWRENCE SULLIVAN, ANTITRUST § 12, at 41 (1977)) (only substitutes that can enter the market "promptly" should be considered). The District Court expressly considered and rejected Microsoft's claims that innovations such as handheld devices and portal websites would soon expand the relevant market beyond Intel-compatible PC operating systems. Because the company does not challenge these findings, we have no reason to believe that prompt substitutes are available. The structural approach, as applied by the District Court, is thus capable of fulfilling its purpose even in a changing market. Microsoft cites no case, nor are we aware of one, requiring direct evidence to show monopoly power in any market. We decline to adopt such a rule now.

Even if we were to require direct proof, moreover, Microsoft's behavior may well be sufficient to show the existence of monopoly power. Certainly, none of the conduct Microsoft points to—its investment in R&D and the relatively low price of Windows—is inconsistent with the possession of such power. Conclusions of Law, at 37. The R&D expenditures Microsoft points to are not simply for Windows, but for its entire company, which most likely does not possess a monopoly for all of its products. Moreover, because innovation can increase an already dominant market share and further delay the emergence of competition, even monopolists have reason to invest in R&D. Findings of Fact ¶ 61. Microsoft's pricing behavior is similarly equivocal. The company claims only that it never charged the short-term profit-maximizing price for Windows. Faced with conflicting expert testimony, the District Court found that it could not accurately determine what this price would be. Id. ¶ 65. In any event, the court found, a price lower than the short-term profit-maximizing price is not inconsistent with possession or improper use of monopoly power. Id. ¶ ¶ 65-66. Cf. Berkey Photo, Inc. v.

Eastman Kodak Co., 603 F.2d 263, 274 (2d Cir. 1979) ("[I]f monopoly power has been acquired or maintained through improper means, the fact that the power has not been used to extract [a monopoly price] provides no succor to the monopolist."). Microsoft never claims that it did not charge the long-term monopoly price. Micosoft does argue that the price of Windows is a fraction of the price of an Intel-compatible PC system and lower than that of rival operating systems, but these facts are not inconsistent with the District Court's finding that Microsoft has monopoly power. See Findings of Fact ¶ 36 ("Intel-compatible PC operating systems other than Windows [would not] attract[ ] significant demand ... even if Micosoft held its prices substantially above the competitive level.").

More telling, the District Court found that some aspects of Microsoft's behavior are difficult to explain unless Windows is a monopoly product. For instance, according to the District Court, the company set the price of Windows without considering rivals' prices, Findings of Fact ¶ 62, something a firm without a monopoly would have been unable to do. The District Court also found that Microsoft's pattern of exclusionary conduct could only be rational "if the firm knew that it possessed monopoly power." Conclusions of Law, at 37. It is to that conduct that we now turn.

B. Anticompetitive Conduct

As discussed above, having a monopoly does not by itself violate § 2. A firm violates § 2 only when it acquires or maintains, or attempts to acquire or maintain, a monopoly by engaging in exclusionary conduct "as distinguished from growth or development as a consequence of a superior product, business acumen, or historic accident." Grinnell, 384 U.S. at 571; see also United States v. Aluminum Co. of Am., 148 F.2d 416, 430 (2d Cir. 1945) (Hand, J.) ("The successful competitor, having been urged to compete, must not be turned upon when he wins.").

In this case, after concluding that Microsoft had monopoly power, the District Court held that Microsoft had violated § 2 by engaging in a variety of exclusionary acts (not including predatory pricing), to maintain its monopoly by preventing the effective distribution and use of products that might threaten that monopoly. Specifically, the District Court held Microsoft liable for: (1) the way in which it integrated IE into

Windows; (2) its various dealings with Original Equipment Manufacturers ("OEMs"), Internet Access Providers ("IAPs"), Internet Content Providers ("ICPs"), Independent Software Vendors ("ISVs"), and Apple Computer; (3) its efforts to contain and to subvert Java technologies; and (4) its course of conduct as a whole. Upon appeal, Microsoft argues that it did not engage in any exclusionary conduct.

Whether any particular act of a monopolist is exclusionary, rather than merely a form of vigorous competition, can be difficult to discern: the means of illicit exclusion, like the means of legitimate competition, are myriad. The challenge for an antitrust court lies in stating a general rule for distinguishing between exclusionary acts, which reduce social welfare, and competitive acts, which increase it.

From a century of case law on monopolization under § 2, however, several principles do emerge. First, to be condemned as exclusionary, a monopolist's act must have an "anticompetitive effect." That is, it must harm the competitive process and thereby harm consumers. In contrast, harm to one or more competitors will not suffice. "The [Sherman Act] directs itself not against conduct which is competitive, even severely so, but against conduct which unfairly tends to destroy competition itself." Spectrum Sports, Inc. v. McQuillan, 506 U.S. 447, 458 (1993); see also Brooke Group Ltd. v. Brown & Williamson Tobacco Corp., 509 U.S. 209, 225 (1993) ("Even an act of pure malice by one business competitor against another does not, without more, state a claim under the federal antitrust laws....").

Second, the plaintiff, on whom the burden of proof of course rests, see, e.g., Monsanto Co. v. Spray-Rite Serv. Corp., 465 U.S. 752, 763 (1984); see also United States v. Arnold, Schwinn & Co., 388 U.S. 365, 374 n.5 (1967), overruled on other grounds, Cont'l T.V., Inc. v. GTE Sylvania Inc., 433 U.S. 36 (1977), must demonstrate that the monopolist's conduct indeed has the requisite anticompetitive effect. See generally Brooke Group, 509 U.S. at 225-26. In a case brought by a private plaintiff, the plaintiff must show that its injury is "of 'the type that the statute was intended to forestall,' " Brunswick Corp. v. Pueblo Bowl-O-Mat, Inc., 429 U.S. 477, 487-88 (1977) (quoting Wyandotte Transp. v. United States, 389 U.S. 191, 202 (1967)); no less in a case brought by the Government, it must demonstrate that the monopolist's conduct harmed competition, not just a competitor.

Third, if a plaintiff successfully establishes a prima facie case under § 2 by demonstrating anticompetitive effect, then the monopolist may proffer a "procompetitive justification" for its conduct. See Eastman Kodak, 504 U.S. at 483. If the monopolist asserts a procompetitive justification—a nonpretextual claim that its conduct is indeed a form of competition on the merits because it involves, for example, greater efficiency or enhanced consumer appeal—then the burden shifts back to the plaintiff to rebut that claim. Cf. Capital Imaging Assocs., P.C. v. Mohawk Valley Med. Assocs., Inc., 996 F.2d 537, 543 (2d Cir. 1993).

Fourth, if the monopolist's procompetitive justification stands unrebutted, then the plaintiff must demonstrate that the anticompetitive harm of the conduct outweighs the procompetitive benefit. In cases arising under § 1 of the Sherman Act, the courts routinely apply a similar balancing approach under the rubric of the "rule of reason." The source of the rule of reason is Standard Oil Co. v. United States, 221 U.S. 1 (1911), in which the Supreme Court used that term to describe the proper inquiry under both sections of the Act. See id. at 61-62 ("[W]hen the second section [of the Sherman Act] is thus harmonized with ... the first, it becomes obvious that the criteria to be resorted to in any given case for the purpose of ascertaining whether violations of the section have been committed, is the rule of reason guided by the established law...."). As the Fifth Circuit more recently explained, "[i]t is clear ... that the analysis under section 2 is similar to that under section 1 regardless whether the rule of reason label is applied...." Mid-Texas Communications Sys., Inc. v. AT & T, 615 F.2d 1372, 1389 n.13 (5th Cir. 1980) (citing Byars v. Bluff City News Co., 609 F.2d 843, 860 (6th Cir. 1979)); see also Cal. Computer Prods., Inc. v. IBM Corp., 613 F.2d 727, 737 (9th Cir. 1979).

Finally, in considering whether the monopolist's conduct on balance harms competition and is therefore condemned as exclusionary for purposes of § 2, our focus is upon the effect of that conduct, not upon the intent behind it. Evidence of the intent behind the conduct of a monopolist is relevant only to the extent it helps us understand the likely effect of the monopolist's conduct. See, e.g., Chicago Bd. of Trade v. United States, 246 U.S. 231, 238 (1918) ("knowledge of intent may help the court to interpret facts and to predict consequences"); Aspen Skiing Co. v. Aspen Highlands Skiing Corp., 472 U.S. 585, 603 (1985).

With these principles in mind, we now consider Microsoft's objections to the District Court's holding that Microsoft violated § 2 of the Sherman Act in a variety of ways.

1. Licenses Issued to Original Equipment Manufacturers

The District Court condemned a number of provisions in Microsoft's agreements licensing Windows to OEMs, because it found that Microsoft's imposition of those provisions (like many of Microsoft's other actions at issue in this case) serves to reduce usage share of Netscape's browser and, hence, protect Microsoft's operating system monopoly. The reason market share in the browser market affects market power in the operating system market is complex, and warrants some explanation.

Browser usage share is important because, as we explained in Section II.A above, a browser (or any middleware product, for that matter) must have a critical mass of users in order to attract software developers to write applications relying upon the APIs it exposes, and away from the APIs exposed by Windows. Applications written to a particular browser's APIs, however, would run on any computer with that browser, regardless of the underlying operating system. "The overwhelming majority of consumers will only use a PC operating system for which there already exists a large and varied set of ... applications, and for which it seems relatively certain that new types of applications and new versions of existing applications will continue to be marketed...."

Findings of Fact ¶ 30. If a consumer could have access to the applications he desired—regardless of the operating system he uses—simply by installing a particular browser on his computer, then he would no longer feel compelled to select Windows in order to have access to those applications; he could select an operating system other than Windows based solely upon its quality and price. In other words, the market for operating systems would be competitive.

Therefore, Microsoft's efforts to gain market share in one market (browsers) served to meet the threat to Microsoft's monopoly in another market (operating systems) by keeping rival browsers from gaining the critical mass of users necessary to attract developer attention away from Windows as the platform for software development. Plaintiffs also argue that Microsoft's actions injured competition in the browser market—an argument we will examine below in relation to their specific claims that Microsoft attempted to monopolize the browser market and unlawfully tied its browser to its operating system so as to foreclose competition in the browser market. In evaluating the § 2 monopoly maintenance claim, however, our immediate concern is with the anticompetitive effect of Microsoft's conduct in preserving its monopoly in the operating system market.

In evaluating the restrictions in Microsoft's agreements licensing Windows to OEMs, we first consider whether plaintiffs have made out a prima facie case by demonstrating that the restrictions have an anticompetitive effect. In the next subsection, we conclude that plaintiffs have met this burden as to all the restrictions. We then consider Microsoft's proffered justifications for the restrictions and, for the most part, hold those justifications insufficient.

a. Anticompetitive effect of the license restrictions

The restrictions Microsoft places upon Original Equipment Manufacturers are of particular importance in determining browser usage share because having an OEM pre-install a browser on a computer is one of the two most cost-effective methods by far of distributing browsing software. (The other is bundling the browser with internet access software distributed by an IAP.) Findings of Fact ¶ 145. The District Court found that the restrictions Microsoft imposed in licensing Windows to OEMs prevented many OEMs from distributing browsers other than IE. Conclusions of Law, at 39-40. In particular, the District Court condemned the license provisions prohibiting the OEMs from: (1) removing any desktop icons, folders, or "Start" menu entries; (2) altering the initial boot sequence; and (3) otherwise altering the appearance of the Windows desktop. Findings of Fact ¶ 213.

The District Court concluded that the first license restriction—the prohibition upon the removal of desktop icons, folders, and Start menu entries—thwarts the distribution of a rival browser by preventing OEMs from removing visible means of user access to IE. Id. ¶ 203. The OEMs cannot practically install a second browser in addition to IE, the court found, in part because "[p]re-installing more than one product in a given category ... can significantly increase an OEM's support costs, for the redundancy can lead to confusion among novice users." Id. ¶ 159; see also id. ¶ 217. That is, a certain number of novice computer users, seeing two browser icons, will wonder which to use when and will call the OEM's support line. Support calls are extremely expensive and, in the highly competitive original equipment market, firms have a strong incentive to minimize costs. Id. ¶ 210.

Microsoft denies the "consumer confusion" story; it observes that some OEMs do install multiple browsers and that executives from two OEMs that do so denied any knowledge of consumers being confused by multiple icons. See 11/5/98 pm Tr. at 41-42 (trial testimony of Avadis Tevanian of Apple), reprinted in 9 J.A. at 5493-94; 11/18/99 am Tr. at 69 (trial testimony of John Soyring of IBM), reprinted in 10 J.A. at 6222.

Other testimony, however, supports the District Court's finding that fear of such confusion deters many OEMs from pre-installing multiple browsers. See, e.g., 01/13/99 pm Tr. at 614-15 (deposition of Microsoft's Gayle McClain played to the court) (explaining that redundancy of icons may be confusing to end users); 02/18/99 pm Tr. at 46-47 (trial testimony of John Rose of Compaq), reprinted in 21 J.A. at 14237-38 (same); 11/17/98 am Tr. at 68 (deposition of John Kies of Packard Bell-NEC played to the court), reprinted in 9 J.A. at 6016 (same); 11/17/98 am Tr. at 67-72 (trial testimony of Glenn Weadock), reprinted in 9 J.A. at 6015-20 (same). Most telling, in presentations to OEMs, Microsoft itself represented that having only one icon in a particular category would be "less confusing for endusers." See Government's Trial Exhibit ("GX") 319 at MS98 0109453. Accordingly, we reject Microsoft's argument that we should vacate the District Court's Finding of Fact 159 as it relates to consumer confusion.

As noted above, the OEM channel is one of the two primary channels for distribution of browsers. By preventing OEMs from removing visible means of user access to IE, the license restriction prevents many OEMs from pre-installing a rival browser and, therefore, protects Microsoft's monopoly from the competition that middleware might otherwise present. Therefore, we conclude that the license restriction at issue is anticompetitive. We defer for the moment the question whether that anticompetitive effect is outweighed by Microsoft's proffered justifications.

The second license provision at issue prohibits OEMs from modifying the initial boot sequence—the process that occurs the first time a consumer turns on the computer. Prior to the imposition of that restriction, "among the programs that many OEMs inserted into the boot sequence were Internet sign-up procedures that encouraged users to choose from a list of IAPs assembled by the OEM." Findings of Fact ¶ 210. Microsoft's prohibition on any alteration of the boot sequence thus prevents OEMs from using that process to promote the services of IAPs, many of which—at least at the time Microsoft imposed the restriction—used Navigator rather than IE in their internet access software. See id. ¶ 212; GX 295, reprinted in 12 J.A. at 14533 (Upon learning of OEM practices including boot sequence modification, Microsoft's Chairman, Bill Gates, wrote: "Apparently a lot of OEMs are bundling non-Microsoft browsers and coming up with offerings together with [IAPs] that get displayed on their machines in a FAR more prominent way than MSN or our Internet browser."). Microsoft does not deny that the prohibition on modifying the boot sequence has the effect of decreasing competition against IE by preventing OEMs from promoting rivals' browsers. Because this prohibition has a substantial effect in protecting Microsoft's market power, and does so through a means other than competition on the merits, it is anticompetitive. Again the question whether the provision is nonetheless justified awaits later treatment.

Finally, Microsoft imposes several additional provisions that, like the prohibition on removal of icons, prevent OEMs from making various alterations to the desktop: Microsoft prohibits OEMs from causing any user interface other than the Windows desktop to launch automatically, from adding icons or folders different in size or shape from those supplied by Microsoft, and from using the "Active Desktop" feature to promote third-party brands. These restrictions impose significant costs upon the OEMs; prior to Microsoft's prohibiting the practice, many OEMs would change the appearance of the desktop in ways they found beneficial. See, e.g., Findings of Fact ¶ 214; GX 309, reprinted in 22 J.A. at 14551 (March 1997 letter from Hewlett-Packard to Microsoft: "We are responsible for the cost of technical support of our customers, including the 33% of calls we get related to the lack of quality or confusion generated by your product.... We must have more ability to decide how our system is presented to our end users. If we had a choice of another supplier, based on your actions in this area, I assure you [that you] would not be our supplier of choice.").

The dissatisfaction of the OEM customers does not, of course, mean the restrictions are anticompetitive. The anticompetitive effect of the license restrictions is, as Microsoft itself recognizes, that OEMs are not able to promote rival browsers, which keeps developers focused upon the APIs in Windows. Findings of Fact ¶ 212 (quoting Microsoft's Gates as writing, "[w]inning Internet browser share is a very very important goal for us," and emphasizing the need to prevent OEMs from promoting both rival browsers and IAPs that might use rivals' browsers); see also 01/13/99 Tr. at 305-06

(excerpts from deposition of James Von Holle of Gateway) (prior to restriction Gateway had pre-installed non-IE internet registration icon that was larger than other desktop icons). This kind of promotion is not a zero-sum game; but for the restrictions in their licenses to use Windows, OEMs could promote multiple IAPs and browsers. By preventing the OEMs from doing so, this type of license restriction, like the first two restrictions, is anticompetitive: Microsoft reduced rival browsers' usage share not by improving its own product but, rather, by preventing OEMs from taking actions that could increase rivals' share of usage.

b. Microsoft's justifications for the license restrictions

Microsoft argues that the license restrictions are legally justified because, in imposing them, Microsoft is simply "exercising its rights as the holder of valid copyrights." Appellant's Opening Br. at 102. Microsoft also argues that the licenses "do not unduly restrict the opportunities of Netscape to distribute Navigator in any event." Id.

Microsoft's primary copyright argument borders upon the frivolous. The company claims an absolute and unfettered right to use its intellectual property as it wishes: "[I]f intellectual property rights have been lawfully acquired," it says, then "their subsequent exercise cannot give rise to antitrust liability." Appellant's Opening Br. at 105. That is no more correct than the proposition that use of one's personal property, such as a baseball bat, cannot give rise to tort liability. As the Federal Circuit succinctly stated: "Intellectual property rights do not confer a privilege to violate the antitrust laws." In re Indep. Serv. Orgs. Antitrust Litig., 203 F.3d 1322, 1325 (Fed. Cir. 2000).

Although Microsoft never overtly retreats from its bold and incorrect position on the law, it also makes two arguments to the effect that it is not exercising its copyright in an unreasonable manner, despite the anticompetitive consequences of the license restrictions discussed above. In the first variation upon its unqualified copyright defense, Microsoft cites two cases indicating that a copyright holder may limit a licensee's ability to engage in significant and deleterious alterations of a copyrighted work. See Gilliam v. ABC, 538 F.2d 14, 21 (2d Cir. 1976); WGN Cont'l Broad. Co. v. United Video, Inc., 693 F.2d 622, 625 (7th Cir. 1982). The relevance of those two cases for the present one is limited, however, both because those cases involved substantial alterations of a copyrighted work, see Gilliam, 538 F.2d at 18, and because in neither case was there any claim that the copyright holder was, in asserting its rights, violating the antitrust laws, see WGN Cont'l Broad., 693 F.2d at 626; see also Cmty. for Creative Non-Violence v. Reid, 846 F.2d 1485, 1498 (D.C. Cir. 1988) (noting, again in a context free of any antitrust concern, that "an author [ ] may have rights against" a licensee that "excessively mutilated or altered" the copyrighted work).

The only license restriction Microsoft seriously defends as necessary to prevent a "substantial alteration" of its copyrighted work is the prohibition on OEMs automatically launching a substitute user interface upon completion of the boot process. See Findings of Fact ¶ 211 ("[A] few large OEMs developed programs that ran automatically at the conclusion of a new PC system's first boot sequence. These programs replaced the Windows desktop either with a user interface designed by the OEM or with Navigator's user interface."). We agree that a shell that automatically prevents the Windows desktop from ever being seen by the user is a drastic alteration of Microsoft's copyrighted work, and outweighs the marginal anticompetitive effect of prohibiting the OEMs from substituting a different interface automatically upon completion of the initial boot process. We therefore hold that this particular restriction is not an exclusionary practice that violates § 2 of the Sherman Act.

In a second variation upon its copyright defense, Microsoft argues that the license restrictions merely prevent OEMs from taking actions that would reduce substantially the value of Microsoft's copyrighted work: that is, Microsoft claims each license restriction in question is necessary to prevent OEMs from so altering Windows as to undermine "the principal value of Windows as a stable and consistent platform that supports a broad range of applications and that is familiar to users." Appellant's Opening Br. at 102. Microsoft, however, never substantiates this claim, and, because an OEM's altering the appearance of the desktop or promoting programs in the boot sequence does not affect the code already in the product, the practice does not self-evidently affect either the "stability" or the "consistency" of the platform. See Conclusions of Law, at 41; Findings of Fact ¶ 227. Microsoft cites only one item of evidence in support of its claim that the OEMs' alterations were decreasing the value of Windows. Defendant's Trial Exhibit ("DX") 2395 at MSV0009378A, reprinted in 19 J.A. at 12575. That document, prepared by Microsoft itself, states: "there are quality issues created by OEMs who are too liberal with the pre-install process," referring to the OEMs' installation of Windows and additional software on their PCs, which the document says may result in "user concerns and confusion." To the extent the OEMs' modifications cause consumer confusion, of course, the OEMs bear the additional support costs. See Findings of Fact ¶ 159. Therefore, we conclude Microsoft has not shown that the OEMs' liberality reduces the value of Windows except in the sense that their promotion of rival browsers undermines Microsoft's monopoly—and that is not a permissible justification for the license restrictions.

Apart from copyright, Microsoft raises one other defense of the OEM license agreements: It argues that, despite the restrictions in the OEM license, Netscape is not completely blocked from distributing its product. That claim is insufficient to shield Microsoft from liability for those restrictions because, although Microsoft did not bar its rivals from all means of distribution, it did bar them from the cost-efficient ones.

In sum, we hold that with the exception of the one restriction prohibiting automatically launched alternative interfaces, all the OEM license restrictions at issue represent uses of Microsoft's market power to protect its monopoly, unredeemed by any legitimate justification. The restrictions therefore violate § 2 of the Sherman Act.

2. Integration of IE and Windows

Although Microsoft's license restrictions have a significant effect in closing rival browsers out of one of the two primary channels of distribution, the District Court found that "Microsoft's executives believed ... its contractual restrictions placed on OEMs would not be sufficient in themselves to reverse the direction of Navigator's usage share. Consequently, in late 1995 or early 1996, Microsoft set out to bind [IE] more tightly to Windows 95 as a technical matter." Findings of Fact ¶ 160.

Technologically binding IE to Windows, the District Court found, both prevented OEMs from pre-installing other browsers and deterred consumers from using them. In particular, having the IE software code as an irremovable part of Windows meant that pre-installing a second browser would "increase an OEM's product testing costs," because an OEM must test and train its support staff to answer calls related to every software product preinstalled on the machine; moreover, pre-installing a browser in addition to IE would to many OEMs be "a questionable use of the scarce and valuable space on a PC's hard drive." Id. ¶ 159.

Although the District Court, in its Conclusions of Law, broadly condemned Microsoft's decision to bind "Internet Explorer to Windows with ... technological shackles," Conclusions of Law, at 39, its findings of fact in support of that conclusion center upon three specific actions Microsoft took to weld IE to Windows: excluding IE from the "Add/Remove Programs" utility; designing Windows so as in certain circumstances to override the user's choice of a default browser other than IE; and commingling code related to browsing and other code in the same files, so that any attempt to delete the files containing IE would, at the same time, cripple the operating system. As with the license restrictions, we consider first whether the suspect actions had an anticompetitive effect, and then whether Microsoft has provided a procompetitive justification for them.

a. Anticompetitive effect of integration

As a general rule, courts are properly very skeptical about claims that competition has been harmed by a dominant

firm's product design changes. See, e.g., Foremost Pro Color, Inc. v. Eastman Kodak Co., 703 F.2d 534, 544-45 (9th Cir. 1983). In a competitive market, firms routinely innovate in the hope of appealing to consumers, sometimes in the process making their products incompatible with those of rivals; the imposition of liability when a monopolist does the same thing will inevitably deter a certain amount of innovation. This is all the more true in a market, such as this one, in which the product itself is rapidly changing. See Findings of Fact ¶ 59. Judicial deference to product innovation, however, does not mean that a monopolist's product design decisions are per se lawful. See Foremost Pro Color, 703 F.2d at 545; see also Cal. Computer Prods., 613 F.2d at 739, 744; In re IBM Peripheral EDP Devices Antitrust Litig., 481 F. Supp. 965, 1007-08 (N.D. Cal. 1979).

The District Court first condemned as anticompetitive Microsoft's decision to exclude IE from the "Add/Remove Programs" utility in Windows 98. Findings of Fact ¶ 170. Microsoft had included IE in the Add/Remove Programs utility in Windows 95, see id. ¶ ¶ 175-76, but when it modified Windows 95 to produce Windows 98, it took IE out of the Add/Remove Programs utility. This change reduces the usage share of rival browsers not by making Microsoft's own browser more attractive to consumers but, rather, by discouraging OEMs from distributing rival products. See id. ¶ 159. Because Microsoft's conduct, through something other than competition on the merits, has the effect of significantly reducing usage of rivals' products and hence protecting its own operating system monopoly, it is anticompetitive; we defer for the moment the question whether it is nonetheless justified.

Second, the District Court found that Microsoft designed Windows 98 "so that using Navigator on Windows 98 would have unpleasant consequences for users" by, in some circumstances, overriding the user's choice of a browser other than IE as his or her default browser. Id. ¶ ¶ 171-72. Plaintiffs argue that this override harms the competitive process by deterring consumers from using a browser other than IE even though they might prefer to do so, thereby reducing rival browsers' usage share and, hence, the ability of rival browsers to draw developer attention away from the APIs exposed by Windows. Microsoft does not deny, of course, that overriding the user's preference prevents some people from using other browsers. Because the override reduces rivals' usage share and protects Microsoft's monopoly, it too is anticompetitive.

Finally, the District Court condemned Microsoft's decision to bind IE to Windows 98 "by placing code specific to Web browsing in the same files as code that provided operating system functions." Id. ¶ 161; see also id. ¶ ¶ 174, 192. Putting code supplying browsing functionality into a file with code supplying operating system functionality "ensure[s] that the deletion of any file containing browsing-specific routines would also delete vital operating system routines and thus cripple Windows...." Id. ¶ 164. As noted above, preventing an OEM from removing IE deters it from installing a second browser because doing so increases the OEM's product testing and support costs; by contrast, had OEMs been able to remove IE, they might have chosen to pre-install Navigator alone. See id. ¶ 159.

Microsoft denies, as a factual matter, that it commingled browsing and non-browsing code, and it maintains the District Court's findings to the contrary are clearly erroneous. According to Microsoft, its expert "testified without contradiction that '[t]he very same code in Windows 98 that provides Web browsing functionality' also performs essential operating system functions—not code in the same files, but the very same software code." Appellant's Opening Br. at 79 (citing 5 J.A. 3291-92).

Microsoft's expert did not testify to that effect "without contradiction," however. A Government expert, Glenn Weadock, testified that Microsoft "design[ed] [IE] so that some of the code that it uses co-resides in the same library files as other code needed for Windows." Direct Testimony ¶ 30. Another Government expert likewise testified that one library file, SHDOCVW.DLL, "is really a bundle of separate functions. It contains some functions that have to do specifically with Web browsing, and it contains some general user interface functions as well." 12/14/98 am Tr. at 60-61 (trial testimony of Edward Felten), reprinted in 11 J.A. at 6953-54. One of Microsoft's own documents suggests as much. See Plaintiffs' Proposed Findings of Fact ¶ 131.2.vii (citing GX 1686 (under seal) (Microsoft document indicating some functions in SHDOCVW.DLL can be described as "IE only," others can be described as "shell only" and still others can be described as providing both "IE" and "shell" functions)).

In view of the contradictory testimony in the record, some of which supports the District Court's finding that Microsoft commingled browsing and non-browsing code, we cannot conclude that the finding was clearly erroneous. See Anderson v. City of Bessemer City, 470 U.S. 564, 573-74 (1985) ("If the district court's account of the evidence is plausible in light of the record viewed in its entirety, the court of appeals may not reverse it even though convinced that had it been sitting as the trier of fact, it would have weighed the evidence differently."). Accordingly, we reject Microsoft's argument that we should vacate Finding of Fact 159 as it relates to the commingling of code, and we conclude that such commingling has an anticompetitive effect; as noted above, the commingling deters OEMs from pre-installing rival browsers, thereby reducing the rivals' usage share and, hence, developers' interest in rivals' APIs as an alternative to the API set exposed by Microsoft's operating system.

b. Microsoft's justifications for integration

Microsoft proffers no justification for two of the three challenged actions that it took in integrating IE into Windows—excluding IE from the Add/Remove Programs utility and commingling browser and operating system code. Although Microsoft does make some general claims regarding the benefits of integrating the browser and the operating system, see, e.g., Direct Testimony of James Allchin ¶ 94, reprinted in 5 J.A. at 3321 ("Our vision of deeper levels of technical integration is highly efficient and provides substantial benefits to customers and developers."), it neither specifies nor substantiates those claims. Nor does it argue that either excluding IE from the Add/Remove Programs utility or commingling code achieves any integrative benefit. Plaintiffs plainly made out a prima facie case of harm to competition in the operating system market by demonstrating that Microsoft's actions increased its browser usage share and thus protected its operating system monopoly from a middleware threat and, for its part, Microsoft failed to meet its burden of showing that its conduct serves a purpose other than protecting its operating system monopoly. Accordingly, we hold that Microsoft's exclusion of IE from the Add/Remove Programs utility and its commingling of browser and operating system code constitute exclusionary conduct, in violation of § 2.

As for the other challenged act that Microsoft took in integrating IE into Windows—causing Windows to override the user's choice of a default browser in certain circumstances—Microsoft argues that it has "valid technical reasons." Specifically, Microsoft claims that it was necessary to design Windows to override the user's preferences when he or she invokes one of "a few" out "of the nearly 30 means of accessing the Internet." Appellant's Opening Br. at 82. According to Microsoft:

> The Windows 98 Help system and Windows Update feature depend on ActiveX controls not supported by Navigator, and the now-discontinued Channel Bar utilized Microsoft's Channel Definition Format, which Navigator also did not support. Lastly, Windows 98 does not invoke Navigator if a user accesses the Internet through "My Computer" or "Windows Explorer" because doing so would defeat one of the purposes of those features—enabling users to move seamlessly from local storage devices to the Web in the same browsing window.

Id. (internal citations omitted). The plaintiff bears the burden not only of rebutting a proffered justification but also of demonstrating that the anticompetitive effect of the challenged action outweighs it. In the District Court, plaintiffs appear to have done neither, let alone both; in any event, upon appeal, plaintiffs offer no rebuttal whatsoever. Accordingly, Microsoft may not be held liable for this aspect of its product design.

3. Agreements with Internet Access Providers

The District Court also condemned as exclusionary Microsoft's agreements with various IAPs. The IAPs include both Internet Service Providers, which offer consumers internet access, and Online Services ("OLSs") such as America Online

("AOL"), which offer proprietary content in addition to internet access and other services. Findings of Fact ¶ 15. The District Court deemed Microsoft's agreements with the IAPs unlawful because:

> Microsoft licensed [IE] and the [IE] Access Kit [(of which, more below)] to hundreds of IAPs for no charge. [Findings of Fact] ¶ ¶ 250-51. Then, Microsoft extended valuable promotional treatment to the ten most important IAPs in exchange for their commitment to promote and distribute [IE] and to exile Navigator from the desktop. Id. ¶ ¶ 255-58, 261, 272, 288-90, 305-06. Finally, in exchange for efforts to upgrade existing subscribers to client software that came bundled with [IE] instead of Navigator, Microsoft granted rebates—and in some cases made outright payments—to those same IAPs. Id. ¶ ¶ 259-60, 295.

Conclusions of Law, at 41.

The District Court condemned Microsoft's actions in (1) offering IE free of charge to IAPs and (2) offering IAPs a bounty for each customer the IAP signs up for service using the IE browser. In effect, the court concluded that Microsoft is acting to preserve its monopoly by offering IE to IAPs at an attractive price. Similarly, the District Court held Microsoft liable for (3) developing the IE Access Kit ("IEAK"), a software package that allows an IAP to "create a distinctive identity for its service in as little as a few hours by customizing the [IE] title bar, icon, start and search pages," Findings of Fact ¶ 249, and (4) offering the IEAK to IAPs free of charge, on the ground that those acts, too, helped Microsoft preserve its monopoly. Conclusions of Law, at 41-42. Finally, the District Court found that (5) Microsoft agreed to provide easy access to IAPs' services from the Windows desktop in return for the IAPs' agreement to promote IE exclusively and to keep shipments of internet access software using Navigator under a specific percentage, typically 25%. See Conclusions of Law, at 42 (citing Findings of Fact ¶ ¶ 258, 262, 289). We address the first four items—Microsoft's inducements—and then its exclusive agreements with IAPs.

Although offering a customer an attractive deal is the hallmark of competition, the Supreme Court has indicated that in very rare circumstances a price may be unlawfully low, or "predatory." See generally Brooke Group, 509 U.S. at 220-27. Plaintiffs argued before the District Court that Microsoft's pricing was indeed predatory; but instead of making the usual predatory pricing argument—that the predator would drive out its rivals by pricing below cost on a particular product and then, sometime in the future, raise its prices on that product above the competitive level in order to recoup its earlier losses—plaintiffs argued that by pricing below cost on IE (indeed, even paying people to take it), Microsoft was able simultaneously to preserve its stream of monopoly profits on Windows, thereby more than recouping its investment in below-cost pricing on IE. The District Court did not assign liability for predatory pricing, however, and plaintiffs do not press this theory on appeal.

The rare case of price predation aside, the antitrust laws do not condemn even a monopolist for offering its product at an attractive price, and we therefore have no warrant to condemn Microsoft for offering either IE or the IEAK free of charge or even at a negative price. Likewise, as we said above, a monopolist does not violate the Sherman Act simply by developing an attractive product. See Grinnell, 384 U.S. at 571 ("[G]rowth or development as a consequence of a superior product [or] business acumen" is no violation.). Therefore, Microsoft's development of the IEAK does not violate the Sherman Act.

We turn now to Microsoft's deals with IAPs concerning desktop placement. Microsoft concluded these exclusive agreements with all "the leading IAPs," Findings of Fact ¶ 244, including the major OLSs. Id. ¶ 245; see also id. ¶ ¶ 305, 306. The most significant of the OLS deals is with AOL, which, when the deal was reached, "accounted for a substantial portion of all existing Internet access subscriptions and ... attracted a very large percentage of new IAP subscribers." Id. ¶ 272. Under that agreement Microsoft puts the AOL icon in the OLS folder on the Windows desktop and AOL does not promote any non-Microsoft browser, nor provide software using any non-Microsoft browser except at the customer's request, and even then AOL will not supply more than 15% of its subscribers with a browser other than IE. Id. ¶ 289.

The Supreme Court most recently considered an antitrust challenge to an exclusive contract in Tampa Electric Co. v. Nashville Coal Co., 365 U.S. 320 (1961). That case, which involved a challenge to a requirements contract, was brought under § 3 of the Clayton Act and §§ 1 and 2 of the Sherman Act. The Court held that an exclusive contract does not violate the Clayton Act unless its probable effect is to "foreclose competition in a substantial share of the line of commerce affected." Id. at 327. The share of the market foreclosed is important because, for the contract to have an adverse effect upon competition, "the opportunities for other traders to enter into or remain in that market must be significantly limited." Id. at 328. Although "[n]either the Court of Appeals nor the District Court [had] considered in detail the question of the relevant market," id. at 330, the Court in Tampa Electric examined the record and, after defining the relevant market, determined that the contract affected less than one percent of that market. Id. at 333. After concluding, under the Clayton Act, that this share was "conservatively speaking, quite insubstantial," id., the Court went on summarily to reject the Sherman Act claims. Id. at 335 ("[I]f [the contract] does not fall within the broader prescription of § 3 of the Clayton Act it follows that it is not forbidden by those of the [Sherman Act].").

Following Tampa Electric, courts considering antitrust challenges to exclusive contracts have taken care to identify the share of the market foreclosed. Some courts have indicated that § 3 of the Clayton Act and § 1 of the Sherman Act require an equal degree of foreclosure before prohibiting exclusive contracts. See, e.g., Roland Mach. Co. v. Dresser Indus., Inc., 749 F.2d 380, 393 (7th Cir. 1984) (Posner, J.). Other courts, however, have held that a higher market share must be foreclosed in order to establish a violation of the Sherman Act as compared to the Clayton Act. See, e.g., Barr Labs. v. Abbott Labs., 978 F.2d 98, 110 (3d Cir.1992); 11 HERBERT HOVENKAMP, ANTITRUST LAW ¶ 1800c4 (1998) ("[T]he cases are divided, with a likely majority stating that the

Though what is "significant" may vary depending upon the antitrust provision under which an exclusive deal is challenged, it is clear that in all cases the plaintiff must both define the relevant market and prove the degree of foreclosure. This is a prudential requirement; exclusivity provisions in contracts may serve many useful purposes. See, e.g., Omega Envtl., Inc. v. Gilbarco, Inc., 127 F.3d 1157, 1162 (9th Cir. 1997) ("There are, however, well-recognized economic benefits to exclusive dealing arrangements, including the enhancement of interbrand competition."); Barry Wright Corp. v. ITT Grinnell Corp., 724 F.2d 227, 236 (1st Cir. 1983) (Breyer, J.) ("[V]irtually every contract to buy 'forecloses' or 'excludes' alternative sellers from some portion of the market, namely the portion consisting of what was bought."). Permitting an antitrust action to proceed any time a firm enters into an exclusive deal would both discourage a presumptively legitimate business practice and encourage costly antitrust actions. Because an exclusive deal affecting a small fraction of a market clearly cannot have the requisite harmful effect upon competition, the requirement of a significant degree of foreclosure serves a useful screening function. Cf. Frank H. Easterbrook, The Limits of Antitrust, 63 TEX. L. REV. 1, 21-23 (1984) (discussing use of presumptions in antitrust law to screen out cases in which loss to consumers and economy is likely outweighed by cost of inquiry and risk of deterring procompetitive behavior).

In this case, plaintiffs challenged Microsoft's exclusive dealing arrangements with the IAPs under both §§ 1 and 2 of the Sherman Act. The District Court, in analyzing the § 1 claim, stated, "unless the evidence demonstrates that Microsoft's agreements excluded Netscape altogether from access to roughly forty percent of the browser market, the Court should decline to find such agreements in violation of § 1." Conclusions of Law, at 52. The court recognized that Microsoft had substantially excluded Netscape from "the most efficient channels for Navigator to achieve browser usage share," id. at 53; see also Findings of Fact ¶ 145 ("[N]o other distribution channel for browsing software even approaches the efficiency of OEM pre-installation and IAP bundling."), and had relegated it to more costly and less effective methods (such as mass mailing its browser on a disk or offering it for download over the internet); but because Microsoft has not "completely excluded Netscape" from reaching any potential user by some means of distribution, however ineffective, the court concluded the agreements do not violate § 1. Conclusions of Law, at 53. Plaintiffs did not cross-appeal this holding.

Turning to § 2, the court stated: "the fact that Microsoft's arrangements with various [IAPs and other] firms did not foreclose enough of the relevant market to constitute a § 1 violation in no way detracts from the Court's assignment of liability for the same arrangements under § 2.... [A]ll of Microsoft's agreements, including the non-exclusive ones, severely restricted Netscape's access to those distribution channels leading most efficiently to the acquisition of browser usage share." Conclusions of Law, at 53.

On appeal Microsoft argues that "courts have applied the same standard to alleged exclusive dealing agreements under both Section 1 and Section 2," Appellant's Opening Br. at 109, and it argues that the District Court's holding of no liability under § 1 necessarily precludes holding it liable under § 2. The District Court appears to have based its holding with respect to § 1 upon a "total exclusion test" rather than the 40% standard drawn from the caselaw. Even assuming the holding is correct, however, we nonetheless reject Microsoft's contention.

The basic prudential concerns relevant to §§ 1 and 2 are admittedly the same: exclusive contracts are commonplace—particularly in the field of distribution—in our competitive, market economy, and imposing upon a firm with market power the risk of an antitrust suit every time it enters into such a contract, no matter how small the effect, would create an unacceptable and unjustified burden upon any such firm. At the same time, however, we agree with plaintiffs that a monopolist's use of exclusive contracts, in certain circumstances, may give rise to a § 2 violation even though the contracts foreclose less than the roughly 40% or 50% share usually required in order to establish a § 1 violation. See generally Dennis W. Carlton, A General Analysis of Exclusionary Conduct and Refusal to Deal—Why Aspen and Kodak Are Misguided, 68 ANTITRUST L.J. 659 (2001) (explaining various scenarios under which exclusive dealing, particularly by a dominant firm, may raise legitimate concerns about harm to competition).

In this case, plaintiffs allege that, by closing to rivals a substantial percentage of the available opportunities for browser distribution, Microsoft managed to preserve its monopoly in the market for operating systems. The IAPs constitute one of the two major channels by which browsers can be distributed. Findings of Fact ¶ 242. Microsoft has exclusive deals with "fourteen of the top fifteen access providers in North America[, which] account for a large majority of all Internet access subscriptions in this part of the world." Id. ¶ 308. By ensuring that the "majority" of all IAP subscribers are offered IE either as the default browser or as the only browser, Microsoft's deals with the IAPs clearly have a significant effect in preserving its monopoly; they help keep usage of Navigator below the critical level necessary for Navigator or any other rival to pose a real threat to Microsoft's monopoly. See, e.g., id. ¶ 143 (Microsoft sought to "divert enough browser usage from Navigator to neutralize it as a platform."); see also Carlton, at 670.

Plaintiffs having demonstrated a harm to competition, the burden falls upon Microsoft to defend its exclusive dealing contracts with IAPs by providing a procompetitive justification for them. Significantly, Microsoft's only explanation for its exclusive dealing is that it wants to keep developers focused upon its APIs—which is to say, it wants to preserve its power in the operating system market. 02/26/01 Ct. Appeals Tr. at 45-47. That is not an unlawful end, but neither is it a procompetitive justification for the specific means here in question, namely exclusive dealing contracts with IAPs. Accordingly, we affirm the District Court's decision holding that Microsoft's exclusive contracts with IAPs are exclusionary devices, in violation of § 2 of the Sherman Act.

4. Dealings with Internet Content Providers, Independent Software Vendors, and Apple Computer

The District Court held that Microsoft engages in exclusionary conduct in its dealings with ICPs, which develop websites; ISVs, which develop software; and Apple, which is both an OEM and a software developer. See Conclusions of Law, at 42-43 (deals with ICPs, ISVs, and Apple "supplemented Microsoft's efforts in the OEM and IAP channels"). The District Court condemned Microsoft's deals with ICPs and ISVs, stating: "By granting ICPs and ISVs free licenses to bundle [IE] with their offerings, and by exchanging other valuable inducements for their agreement to distribute, promote[,] and rely on [IE] rather than Navigator, Microsoft directly induced developers to focus on its own APIs rather than ones exposed by Navigator." Id. (citing Findings of Fact ¶ ¶ 334-35, 340).

With respect to the deals with ICPs, the District Court's findings do not support liability. After reviewing the ICP agreements, the District Court specifically stated that "there is not sufficient evidence to support a finding that Microsoft's promotional restrictions actually had a substantial, deleterious impact on Navigator's usage share." Findings of Fact ¶ 332. Because plaintiffs failed to demonstrate that Microsoft's deals with the ICPs have a substantial effect upon competition, they have not proved the violation of the Sherman Act.

As for Microsoft's ISV agreements, however, the District Court did not enter a similar finding of no substantial effect. The District Court described Microsoft's deals with ISVs as follows:

> In dozens of "First Wave" agreements signed between the fall of 1997 and the spring of 1998, Microsoft has promised to give preferential support, in the form of early Windows 98 and Windows NT betas, other technical information, and the right to use certain Microsoft > seals of approval, to important ISVs that agree to certain conditions. One of these conditions is that the ISVs use Internet Explorer as the default browsing software for any software they develop with a hypertext-based user interface. Another condition is that the ISVs use Microsoft's "HTML Help," which is accessible only with Internet Explorer, to implement their applications' help systems.

Id. ¶ 339. The District Court further found that the effect of these deals is to "ensure [ ] that many of the most popular Web-centric applications will rely on browsing technologies found only in Windows," id. ¶ 340, and that Microsoft's deals with ISVs therefore "increase[ ] the likelihood that the millions of consumers using [applications designed by ISVs that entered into agreements with Microsoft] will use Internet Explorer rather than Navigator." Id. ¶ 340.

The District Court did not specifically identify what share of the market for browser distribution the exclusive deals with the ISVs foreclose. Although the ISVs are a relatively small channel for browser distribution, they take on greater significance because, as discussed above, Microsoft had largely foreclosed the two primary channels to its rivals. In that light, one can tell from the record that by affecting the applications used by "millions" of consumers, Microsoft's exclusive deals with the ISVs had a substantial effect in further foreclosing rival browsers from the market. (Data introduced by Microsoft, see Direct Testimony of Cameron Myhrvold ¶ 84, reprinted in 6 J.A. at 3922-23, and subsequently relied upon by the District Court in its findings, see, e.g., Findings of Fact ¶ 270, indicate that over the two-year period 1997-98, when Microsoft entered into the First Wave agreements, there were 40 million new users of the internet.) Because, by keeping rival browsers from gaining widespread distribution (and potentially attracting the attention of developers away from the APIs in Windows), the deals have a substantial effect in preserving Microsoft's monopoly, we hold that plaintiffs have made a prima facie showing that the deals have an anticompetitive effect.

Of course, that Microsoft's exclusive deals have the anti-competitive effect of preserving Microsoft's monopoly does not, in itself, make them unlawful. A monopolist, like a competitive firm, may have a perfectly legitimate reason for wanting an exclusive arrangement with its distributors. Accordingly, Microsoft had an opportunity to, but did not, present the District Court with evidence demonstrating that the exclusivity provisions have some such procompetitive justification. See Conclusions of Law, at 43 (citing Findings of Fact ¶ ¶ 339-40) ("With respect to the ISV agreements, Microsoft has put forward no procompetitive business ends whatsoever to justify their exclusionary terms."). On appeal Microsoft likewise does not claim that the exclusivity required by the deals serves any legitimate purpose; instead, it states only that its ISV agreements reflect an attempt "to persuade ISVs to utilize Internet-related system services in Windows rather than Navigator." Appellant's Opening Br. at 114. As we explained before, however, keeping developers focused upon Windows—that is, preserving the Windows monopoly—is a competitively neutral goal. Microsoft having offered no procompetitive justification for its exclusive dealing arrangements with the ISVs, we hold that those arrangements violate § 2 of the Sherman Act.

Finally, the District Court held that Microsoft's dealings with Apple violated the Sherman Act. See Conclusions of Law, at 42-43. Apple is vertically integrated: it makes both software (including an operating system, Mac OS), and hardware (the Macintosh line of computers). Microsoft primarily makes software, including, in addition to its operating system, a number of popular applications. One, called "Office," is a suite of business productivity applications that Microsoft has ported to Mac OS. The District Court found that "ninety percent of Mac OS users running a suite of office productivity applications [use] Microsoft's Mac Office." Findings of Fact ¶ 344. Further, the District Court found that:

> In 1997, Apple's business was in steep decline, and many doubted that the company would survive much long> er.... [M]any ISVs questioned the wisdom of continuing to spend time and money developing applications for the Mac OS. Had Microsoft announced in the midst of this atmosphere that it was ceasing to develop new versions of Mac Office, a great number of ISVs, customers, developers, and investors would have interpreted the announcement as Apple's death notice.

Id. ¶ 344. Microsoft recognized the importance to Apple of its continued support of Mac Office. See id. ¶ 347 (quoting internal Microsoft e-mail) ("[We] need a way to push these guys[, i.e., Apple] and [threatening to cancel Mac Office] is the only one that seems to make them move."); see also id. ("[Microsoft Chairman Bill] Gates asked whether Microsoft could conceal from Apple in the coming month the fact that Microsoft was almost finished developing Mac Office 97."); id. at ¶ 354 ("I think ... Apple should be using [IE] everywhere and if they don't do it, then we can use Office as a club.").

In June 1997 Microsoft Chairman Bill Gates determined that the company's negotiations with Apple " 'have not been going well at all.... Apple let us down on the browser by making Netscape the standard install.' Gates then reported that he had already called Apple's CEO ... to ask 'how we should announce the cancellation of Mac Office....' " Id. at ¶ 349. The District Court further found that, within a month of Gates' call, Apple and Microsoft had reached an agreement pursuant to which > Microsoft's primary obligation is to continue releasing up-to-date versions of Mac Office for at least five years.... [and] Apple has agreed ... to "bundle the most current version of [IE] ... with [Mac OS]"... [and to] "make [IE] the default [browser]".... Navigator is not installed on the computer hard drive during the default installation, which is the type of installation most users elect to employ.... [The] Agreement further provides that ... Apple may not position icons for non-Microsoft browsing software on the desktop of new Macintosh PC systems or Mac OS upgrades.

Id. ¶ ¶ 350-52. The agreement also prohibits Apple from encouraging users to substitute another browser for IE, and states that Apple will "encourage its employees to use [IE]." Id. ¶ 352.

This exclusive deal between Microsoft and Apple has a substantial effect upon the distribution of rival browsers. If a browser developer ports its product to a second operating system, such as the Mac OS, it can continue to display a common set of APIs. Thus, usage share, not the underlying operating system, is the primary determinant of the platform challenge a browser may pose. Pre-installation of a browser (which can be accomplished either by including the browser with the operating system or by the OEM installing the browser) is one of the two most important methods of browser distribution, and Apple had a not insignificant share of worldwide sales of operating systems. See id. ¶ 35 (Microsoft has 95% of the market not counting Apple and "well above" 80% with Apple included in the relevant market). Because Microsoft's exclusive contract with Apple has a substantial effect in restricting distribution of rival browsers, and because (as we have described several times above) reducing usage share of rival browsers serves to protect Microsoft's monopoly, its deal with Apple must be regarded as anticompetitive. See Conclusions of Law, at 42 (citing Findings of Fact ¶ 356) ("By extracting from Apple terms that significantly diminished the usage of Navigator on the Mac OS, Microsoft helped to ensure that developers would not view Navigator as truly cross-platform middleware.").

Microsoft offers no procompetitive justification for the exclusive dealing arrangement. It makes only the irrelevant claim that the IE-for-Mac Office deal is part of a multifaceted set of agreements between itself and Apple, see Appellant's Opening Br. at 61 ("Apple's 'browsing software' obligation was [not] the quid pro quo for Microsoft's Mac Office obligation[;] ... all of the various obligations ... were part of one 'overall agreement' between the two companies."); that does not mean it has any procompetitive justification. Accordingly, we hold that the exclusive deal with Apple is exclusionary, in violation of § 2 of the Sherman Act.

5. Java

Java, a set of technologies developed by Sun Microsystems, is another type of middleware posing a potential threat to Windows' position as the ubiquitous platform for software development. Findings of Fact ¶ 28. The Java technologies include: (1) a programming language; (2) a set of programs written in that language, called the "Java class libraries," which expose APIs; (3) a compiler, which translates code written by a developer into "bytecode"; and (4) a Java Virtual Machine ("JVM"), which translates bytecode into instructions to the operating system. Id. ¶ 73. Programs calling upon the Java APIs will run on any machine with a "Java runtime environment," that is, Java class libraries and a JVM. Id. ¶ ¶ 73, 74.

In May 1995 Netscape agreed with Sun to distribute a copy of the Java runtime environment with every copy of Navigator, and "Navigator quickly became the principal vehicle by which Sun placed copies of its Java runtime environment on the PC systems of Windows users." Id. ¶ 76. Microsoft, too, agreed to promote the Java technologies—or so it seemed. For at the same time, Microsoft took steps "to maximize the difficulty with which applications written in Java could be ported from Windows to other platforms, and vice versa." Conclusions of Law, at 43. Specifically, the District Court found that Microsoft took four steps to exclude Java from developing as a viable cross-platform threat: (a) designing a JVM incompatible with the one developed by Sun; (b) entering into contracts, the so-called "First Wave Agreements," requiring major ISVs to promote Microsoft's JVM exclusively; (c) deceiving Java developers about the Windows-specific nature of the tools it distributed to them; and (d) coercing Intel to stop aiding Sun in improving the Java technologies.

a. The incompatible JVM

The District Court held that Microsoft engaged in exclusionary conduct by developing and promoting its own JVM. Conclusions of Law, at 43-44. Sun had already developed a JVM for the Windows operating system when Microsoft began work on its version. The JVM developed by Microsoft allows Java applications to run faster on Windows than does Sun's JVM, Findings of Fact ¶ 389, but a Java application designed to work with Microsoft's JVM does not work with Sun's JVM and vice versa. Id. ¶ 390. The District Court found that Microsoft "made a large investment of engineering resources to develop a high-performance Windows JVM," id. ¶ 396, and, "[b]y bundling its ... JVM with every copy of [IE] ... Microsoft endowed its Java runtime environment with the unique attribute of guaranteed, enduring ubiquity across the enormous Windows installed base," id. ¶ 397. As explained above, however, a monopolist does not violate the antitrust laws simply by developing a product that is incompatible with those of its rivals. See supra Section II.B.1. In order to violate the antitrust laws, the incompatible product must have an anticompetitive effect that outweighs any procompetitive justification for the design. Microsoft's JVM is not only incompatible with Sun's, it allows Java applications to run faster on Windows than does Sun's JVM. Microsoft's faster JVM lured Java developers into using Microsoft's developer tools, and Microsoft offered those tools deceptively, as we discuss below. The JVM, however, does allow applications to run more swiftly and does not itself have any anticompetitive effect. Therefore, we reverse the District Court's imposition of liability for Microsoft's development and promotion of its JVM.

b. The First Wave Agreements

The District Court also found that Microsoft entered into First Wave Agreements with dozens of ISVs to use Microsoft's JVM. See Findings of Fact ¶ 401 ("[I]n exchange for costly technical support and other blandishments, Microsoft induced dozens of important ISVs to make their Java applications reliant on Windows-specific technologies and to refrain from distributing to Windows users JVMs that complied with Sun's standards."). Again, we reject the District Court's condemnation of low but non-predatory pricing by Microsoft.

To the extent Microsoft's First Wave Agreements with the ISVs conditioned receipt of Windows technical information upon the ISVs' agreement to promote Microsoft's JVM exclusively, they raise a different competitive concern. The District Court found that, although not literally exclusive, the deals were exclusive in practice because they required developers to make Microsoft's JVM the default in the software they developed. Id. ¶ 401.

While the District Court did not enter precise findings as to the effect of the First Wave Agreements upon the overall distribution of rival JVMs, the record indicates that Microsoft's deals with the major ISVs had a significant effect upon JVM promotion. As discussed above, the products of First Wave ISVs reached millions of consumers. Id. ¶ 340. The First Wave ISVs included such prominent developers as Rational Software, see GX 970, reprinted in 15 J.A. at 9994-10000, "a world leader" in software development tools, see Direct Testimony of Michael Devlin ¶ 2, reprinted in 5 J.A. at 3520, and Symantec, see GX 2071, reprinted in 22 J.A. at 14960-66 (sealed), which, according to Microsoft itself, is "the leading supplier of utilities such as anti-virus software," Defendant's Proposed Findings of Fact ¶ 276, reprinted in 3 J.A. at 1689. Moreover, Microsoft's exclusive deals with the leading ISVs took place against a backdrop of foreclosure: the District Court found that "[w]hen Netscape announced in May 1995 [prior to Microsoft's execution of the First Wave Agreements] that it would include with every copy of Navigator a copy of a Windows JVM that complied with Sun's standards, it appeared that Sun's Java implementation would achieve the necessary ubiquity on Windows." Findings of Fact ¶ 394. As discussed above, however, Microsoft undertook a number of anticompetitive actions that seriously reduced the distribution of Navigator, and the District Court found that those actions thereby seriously impeded distribution of Sun's JVM. Conclusions of Law, at 43-44. Because Microsoft's agreements foreclosed a substantial portion of the field for JVM distribution and because, in so doing, they protected Microsoft's monopoly from a middleware threat, they are anticompetitive.

Microsoft offered no procompetitive justification for the default clause that made the First Wave Agreements exclusive as a practical matter. See Findings of Fact ¶ 401.

Because the cumulative effect of the deals is anticompetitive and because Microsoft has no procompetitive justification for them, we hold that the provisions in the First Wave Agreements requiring use of Microsoft's JVM as the default are exclusionary, in violation of the Sherman Act.

c. Deception of Java developers

Microsoft's "Java implementation" included, in addition to a JVM, a set of software development tools it created to assist ISVs in designing Java applications. The District Court found that, not only were these tools incompatible with Sun's cross-platform aspirations for Java—no violation, to be sure—but Microsoft deceived Java developers regarding the Windows-specific nature of the tools. Microsoft's tools included "certain 'keywords' and 'compiler directives' that could only be executed properly by Microsoft's version of the Java runtime environment for Windows." Id. ¶ 394; see also Direct Testimony of James Gosling ¶ 58, reprinted in 21 J.A. at 13959 (Microsoft added "programming instructions ... that alter the behavior of the code."). As a result, even Java "developers who were opting for portability over performance ... unwittingly [wrote] Java applications that [ran] only on Windows." Conclusions of Law, at 43. That is, developers who relied upon Microsoft's public commitment to cooperate with Sun and who used Microsoft's tools to develop what Microsoft led them to believe were cross-platform applications ended up producing applications that would run only on the Windows operating system.

When specifically accused by a PC Week reporter of fragmenting Java standards so as to prevent cross-platform uses, Microsoft denied the accusation and indicated it was only "adding rich platform support" to what remained a cross-platform implementation. An e-mail message internal to Microsoft, written shortly after the conversation with the reporter, shows otherwise:

> [O]k, i just did a followup call.... [The reporter] liked that i kept pointing customers to w3c standards [(commonly observed internet protocols)].... [but] he accused us of being schizo with this vs. our java approach, i said

> he misunderstood [—] that [with Java] we are merely trying to add rich platform support to an interop layer.... this plays well.... at this point its [sic] not good to create MORE noise around our win32 java classes. instead we should just quietly grow j [(Microsoft's development tools)] share and assume that people will take more advantage of our classes without ever realizing they are building win32-only java apps.

GX 1332, reprinted in 22 J.A. at 14922-23.

Finally, other Microsoft documents confirm that Microsoft intended to deceive Java developers, and predicted that the effect of its actions would be to generate Windows-dependent Java applications that their developers believed would be cross-platform; these documents also indicate that Microsoft's ultimate objective was to thwart Java's threat to Microsoft's monopoly in the market for operating systems. One Microsoft document, for example, states as a strategic goal: "Kill cross-platform Java by grow[ing] the polluted Java market." GX 259, reprinted in 22 J.A. at 14514; see also id. ("Cross-platform capability is by far the number one reason for choosing/using Java.") (emphasis in original).

Microsoft's conduct related to its Java developer tools served to protect its monopoly of the operating system in a manner not attributable either to the superiority of the operating system or to the acumen of its makers, and therefore was anticompetitive. Unsurprisingly, Microsoft offers no procompetitive explanation for its campaign to deceive developers. Accordingly, we conclude this conduct is exclusionary, in violation of § 2 of the Sherman Act.

d. The threat to Intel

The District Court held that Microsoft also acted unlawfully with respect to Java by using its "monopoly power to prevent firms such as Intel from aiding in the creation of cross-platform interfaces." Conclusions of Law, at 43. In 1995 Intel was in the process of developing a high-performance, Windows-compatible JVM. Microsoft wanted Intel to abandon that effort because a fast, cross-platform

JVM would threaten Microsoft's monopoly in the operating system market. At an August 1995 meeting, Microsoft's Gates told Intel that its "cooperation with Sun and Netscape to develop a Java runtime environment ... was one of the issues threatening to undermine cooperation between Intel and Microsoft." Findings of Fact ¶ 396. Three months later, "Microsoft's Paul Maritz told a senior Intel executive that Intel's [adaptation of its multimedia software to comply with] Sun's Java standards was as inimical to Microsoft as Microsoft's support for non-Intel microprocessors would be to Intel." Id. ¶ 405.

Intel nonetheless continued to undertake initiatives related to Java. By 1996 "Intel had developed a JVM designed to run well ... while complying with Sun's cross-platform standards." Id. ¶ 396. In April of that year, Microsoft again urged Intel not to help Sun by distributing Intel's fast, Sun-compliant JVM. Id. And Microsoft threatened Intel that if it did not stop aiding Sun on the multimedia front, then Microsoft would refuse to distribute Intel technologies bundled with Windows. Id. ¶ 404.

Intel finally capitulated in 1997, after Microsoft delivered the coup de grace.

> [O]ne of Intel's competitors, called AMD, solicited support from Microsoft for its "3DX" technology.... Microsoft's Allchin asked Gates whether Microsoft should support 3DX, despite the fact that Intel would oppose it. Gates responded: "If Intel has a real problem with us supporting this then they will have to stop supporting Java Multimedia the way they are. I would gladly give up supporting this if they would back off from their work on JAVA."

Id. ¶ 406.

Microsoft's internal documents and deposition testimony confirm both the anticompetitive effect and intent of its actions. See, e.g., GX 235, reprinted in 22 J.A. at 14502 (Microsoft executive, Eric Engstrom, included among Microsoft's goals for Intel: "Intel to stop helping Sun create Java Multimedia APIs, especially ones that run well ... on Windows."); Deposition of Eric Engstrom at 179 ("We were successful [in convincing Intel to stop aiding Sun] for some period of time.").

Microsoft does not deny the facts found by the District Court, nor does it offer any procompetitive justification for pressuring Intel not to support cross-platform Java. Microsoft lamely characterizes its threat to Intel as "advice." The District Court, however, found that Microsoft's "advice" to Intel to stop aiding cross-platform Java was backed by the threat of retaliation, and this conclusion is supported by the evidence cited above. Therefore we affirm the conclusion that Microsoft's threats to Intel were exclusionary, in violation of § 2 of the Sherman Act.

6. Course of Conduct

The District Court held that, apart from Microsoft's specific acts, Microsoft was liable under § 2 based upon its general "course of conduct." In reaching this conclusion the court relied upon Continental Ore Co. v. Union Carbide & Carbon Corp., 370 U.S. 690, 699 (1962), where the Supreme Court stated, "[i]n [Sherman Act cases], plaintiffs should be given the full benefit of their proof without tightly compartmentalizing the various factual components and wiping the slate clean after scrutiny of each."

Microsoft points out that Continental Ore and the other cases cited by plaintiffs in support of "course of conduct" liability all involve conspiracies among multiple firms, not the conduct of a single firm; in that setting the "course of conduct" is the conspiracy itself, for which all the participants may be held liable. See Appellant's Opening Br. at 112-13. Plaintiffs respond that, as a policy matter, a monopolist's unilateral "campaign of [acts intended to exclude a rival] that in the aggregate has the requisite impact" warrants liability even if the acts viewed individually would be lawful for want of a significant effect upon competition. Appellees' Br. at 82-83.

We need not pass upon plaintiffs' argument, however, because the District Court did not point to any series of acts, each of which harms competition only slightly but the cumulative effect of which is significant enough to form an independent basis for liability. The "course of conduct" section of the District Court's opinion contains, with one exception, only broad, summarizing conclusions. See, e.g., Conclusions of Law, at 44 ("Microsoft placed an oppressive thumb on the scale of competitive fortune...."). The only specific acts to which the court refers are Microsoft's expenditures in promoting its browser, see id. ("Microsoft has expended wealth and foresworn opportunities to realize more...."), which we have explained are not in themselves unlawful. Because the District Court identifies no other specific acts as a basis for "course of conduct" liability, we reverse its conclusion that Microsoft's course of conduct separately violates § 2 of the Sherman Act.

C. Causation

As a final parry, Microsoft urges this court to reverse on the monopoly maintenance claim, because plaintiffs never established a causal link between Microsoft's anticompetitive conduct, in particular its foreclosure of Netscape's and Java's distribution channels, and the maintenance of Microsoft's operating system monopoly. See Findings of Fact ¶ 411 ("There is insufficient evidence to find that, absent Microsoft's actions, Navigator and Java already would have ignited genuine competition in the market for Intel-compatible PC operating systems."). This is the flip side of Microsoft's earlier argument that the District Court should have included middleware in the relevant market. According to Microsoft, the District Court cannot simultaneously find that middleware is not a reasonable substitute and that Microsoft's exclusionary conduct contributed to the maintenance of monopoly power in the operating system market. Microsoft claims that the first finding depended on the court's view that middleware does not pose a serious threat to Windows, see supra Section II.A, while the second finding required the court to find that Navigator and Java would have developed into serious enough cross-platform threats to erode the applications barrier to entry. We disagree.

Microsoft points to no case, and we can find none, standing for the proposition that, as to § 2 liability in an equitable enforcement action, plaintiffs must present direct proof that a defendant's continued monopoly power is precisely attributable to its anticompetitive conduct. As its lone authority, Microsoft cites the following passage from Professor Areeda's antitrust treatise: "The plaintiff has the burden of pleading, introducing evidence, and presumably proving by a preponderance of the evidence that reprehensible behavior has contributed significantly to the ... maintenance of the monopoly." 3 PHILLIP E. AREEDA & HERBERT HOVENKAMP, ANTITRUST LAW ¶ 650c, at 69 (1996) (emphasis added).

But, with respect to actions seeking injunctive relief, the authors of that treatise also recognize the need for courts to infer "causation" from the fact that a defendant has engaged in anticompetitive conduct that "reasonably appear[s] capable of making a significant contribution to ... maintaining monopoly power." Id. ¶ 651c, at 78; see also Morgan v. Ponder, 892 F.2d 1355, 1363 (8th Cir. 1989); Barry Wright, 724 F.2d at 230. To require that § 2 liability turn on a plaintiff's ability or inability to reconstruct the hypothetical marketplace absent a defendant's anticompetitive conduct would only encourage monopolists to take more and earlier anticompetitive action.

We may infer causation when exclusionary conduct is aimed at producers of nascent competitive technologies as well as when it is aimed at producers of established substitutes. Admittedly, in the former case there is added uncertainty, inasmuch as nascent threats are merely potential substitutes. But the underlying proof problem is the same—neither plaintiffs nor the court can confidently reconstruct a product's hypothetical technological development in a world absent the defendant's exclusionary conduct. To some degree, "the defendant is made to suffer the uncertain consequences of its own undesirable conduct." 3 AREEDA & HOVENKAMP, ANTITRUST LAW ¶ 651c, at 78.

Given this rather edentulous test for causation, the question in this case is not whether Java or Navigator would actually have developed into viable platform substitutes, but (1) whether as a general matter the exclusion of nascent threats is the type of conduct that is reasonably capable of contributing significantly to a defendant's continued monopoly power and (2) whether Java and Navigator reasonably constituted nascent threats at the time Microsoft engaged in the anticompetitive conduct at issue. As to the first, suffice it to say that it would be inimical to the purpose of the Sherman Act to allow monopolists free reign to squash nascent, albeit unproven, competitors at will—particularly in industries marked by rapid technological advance and frequent paradigm shifts. Findings of Fact ¶ ¶ 59-60. As to the second, the District Court made ample findings that both Navigator and Java showed potential as middleware platform threats. Findings of Fact ¶ ¶ 68-77. Counsel for Microsoft admitted as much at oral argument. 02/26/01 Ct. Appeals Tr. at 27 ("There are no constraints on output. Marginal costs are essentially zero. And there are to some extent network effects. So a company like Netscape founded in 1994 can be by the middle of 1995 clearly a potentially lethal competitor to Windows because it can supplant its position in the market because of the characteristics of these markets.").

Microsoft's concerns over causation have more purchase in connection with the appropriate remedy issue, i.e., whether the court should impose a structural remedy or merely enjoin the offensive conduct at issue. As we point out later in this opinion, divestiture is a remedy that is imposed only with great caution, in part because its long-term efficacy is rarely certain. See infra Section V.E. Absent some measure of confidence that there has been an actual loss to competition that needs to be restored, wisdom counsels against adopting radical structural relief. See 3 AREEDA & HOVENKAMP, ANTITRUST LAW ¶ 653b, at 91-92 ("[M]ore extensive equitable relief, particularly remedies such as divestiture designed to eliminate the monopoly altogether, raise more serious questions and require a clearer indication of a significant causal connection between the conduct and creation or maintenance of the market power."). But these queries go to questions of remedy, not liability. In short, causation affords Microsoft no defense to liability for its unlawful actions undertaken to maintain its monopoly in the operating system market.

III. Attempted Monopolization

Microsoft further challenges the District Court's determination of liability for "attempt[ing] to monopolize ... any part of the trade or commerce among the several States." 15 U.S.C. § 2 (1997). To establish a § 2 violation for attempted monopolization, "a plaintiff must prove (1) that the defendant has engaged in predatory or anticompetitive conduct with (2) a specific intent to monopolize and (3) a dangerous probability of achieving monopoly power." Spectrum Sports, Inc. v. McQuillan, 506 U.S. 447, 456 (1993); see also Times-Picayune Pub. Co. v. United States, 345 U.S. 594, 626 (1953); Lorain Journal Co. v. United States, 342 U.S. 143, 153-55 (1951). Because a deficiency on any one of the three will defeat plaintiffs' claim, we look no further than plaintiffs' failure to prove a dangerous probability of achieving monopoly power in the putative browser market.

The determination whether a dangerous probability of success exists is a particularly fact-intensive inquiry. Because the Sherman Act does not identify the activities that constitute the offense of attempted monopolization, the court "must examine the facts of each case, mindful that the determination of what constitutes an attempt, as Justice Holmes explained, 'is a question of proximity and degree.' " United States v. Am. Airlines, Inc., 743 F.2d 1114, 1118 (5th Cir. 1984) (quoting Swift & Co. v. United States, 196 U.S. 375, 402 (1904)). The District Court determined that "[t]he evidence supports the conclusion that Microsoft's actions did pose such a danger." Conclusions of Law, at 45. Specifically, the District Court concluded that "Netscape's assent to Microsoft's market division proposal would have, instanter, resulted in Microsoft's attainment of monopoly power in a second market," and that "the proposal itself created a dangerous probability of that result." Conclusions of Law, at 46 (citation omitted). The District Court further concluded that "the predatory course of conduct Microsoft has pursued since June of 1995 has revived the dangerous probability that Microsoft will attain monopoly power in a second market." Id.

At the outset we note a pervasive flaw in the District Court's and plaintiffs' discussion of attempted monopolization. Simply put, plaintiffs have made the same argument under two different headings—monopoly maintenance and attempted monopolization. They have relied upon Microsoft's § 2 liability for monopolization of the operating system market as a presumptive indicator of attempted monopolization of an entirely different market. The District Court implicitly accepted this approach: It agreed with plaintiffs that the events that formed the basis for the § 2 monopolization claim "warrant[ed] additional liability as an illegal attempt to amass monopoly power in 'the browser market.' " Id. at 45 (emphasis added). Thus, plaintiffs and the District Court failed to recognize the need for an analysis wholly independent of the conclusions and findings on monopoly maintenance.

To establish a dangerous probability of success, plaintiffs must as a threshold matter show that the browser market can be monopolized, i.e., that a hypothetical monopolist in that market could enjoy market power. This, in turn, requires plaintiffs (1) to define the relevant market and (2) to demonstrate that substantial barriers to entry protect that market. Because plaintiffs have not carried their burden on either prong, we reverse without remand.

A. Relevant Market

A court's evaluation of an attempted monopolization claim must include a definition of the relevant market. See Spectrum Sports, 506 U.S. at 455-56. Such a definition establishes a context for evaluating the defendant's actions as well as for measuring whether the challenged conduct presented a dangerous probability of monopolization. See id. The District Court omitted this element of the Spectrum Sports inquiry.

Defining a market for an attempted monopolization claim involves the same steps as defining a market for a monopoly maintenance claim, namely a detailed description of the purpose of a browser—what functions may be included and what are not—and an examination of the substitutes that are part of the market and those that are not. See also supra Section II.A. The District Court never engaged in such an analysis nor entered detailed findings defining what a browser is or what products might constitute substitutes. In the Findings of Fact, the District Court (in a section on whether IE and Windows are separate products) stated only that "a Web browser provides the ability for the end user to select, retrieve, and perceive resources on the Web." Findings of Fact ¶ 150. Furthermore, in discussing attempted monopolization in its Conclusions of Law, the District Court failed to demonstrate analytical rigor when it employed varying and imprecise references to the "market for browsing technology for Windows," "the browser market," and "platform-level browsing software." Conclusions of Law, at 45.

Because the determination of a relevant market is a factual question to be resolved by the District Court, see, e.g., All Care Nursing Serv., Inc. v. High Tech Staffing Servs., Inc., 135 F.3d 740, 749 (11th Cir. 1998); Tunis Bros. Co., Inc. v. Ford Motor Co., 952 F.2d 715, 722-23 (3d Cir. 1991); Westman Comm'n Co. v. Hobart Int'l, Inc., 796 F.2d 1216, 1220 (10th Cir. 1986), we would normally remand the case so that the District Court could formulate an appropriate definition. See Pullman-Standard v. Swint, 456 U.S. 273, 291-92 & n.22 (1982); Janini v. Kuwait Univ., 43 F.3d 1534, 1537 (D.C. Cir. 1995); Palmer v. Shultz, 815 F.2d 84, 103 (D.C. Cir. 1987). A remand on market definition is unnecessary, however, because the District Court's imprecision is directly traceable to plaintiffs' failure to articulate and identify evidence before the District Court as to (1) what constitutes a browser (i.e., what are the technological components of or functionalities provided by a browser) and (2) why certain other products are not reasonable substitutes (e.g., browser shells or viewers for individual internet extensions, such as Real Audio Player or Adobe Acrobat Reader). See Plaintiffs' Joint Proposed Findings of Fact, at 817-19, reprinted in 2 J.A. at 1480-82; Plaintiffs' Joint Proposed Conclusions of Law § IV (No. 98-1232); see also Lee v. Interstate Fire & Cas. Co., 86 F.3d 101, 105 (7th Cir. 1996) (stating that remand for development of a factual record is inappropriate where plaintiff failed to meet burden of persuasion and never suggested that additional evidence was necessary). Indeed, when plaintiffs in their Proposed Findings of Fact attempted to define a relevant market for the attempt claim, they pointed only to their separate products analysis for the tying claim. See, e.g., Plaintiffs' Joint Proposed Findings of Fact, at 818, reprinted in 2 J.A. at 1481. However, the separate products analysis for tying purposes is not a substitute for the type of market definition that Spectrum Sports requires. See infra Section IV.A.

Plaintiffs' proposed findings and the District Court's actual findings on attempted monopolization pale in comparison to their counterparts on the monopoly maintenance claim. Compare Findings of Fact ¶ 150, and Plaintiffs' Joint Proposed Findings of Fact, at 817-819, reprinted in 2 J.A. at 1480-82, with Findings of Fact ¶ ¶ 18-66, and Plaintiffs' Joint Proposed Findings of Fact, at 20-31, reprinted in 1 J.A. at 658-69. Furthermore, in their brief and at oral argument before this court, plaintiffs did nothing to clarify or ameliorate this deficiency. See, e.g., Appellees' Br. at 93-94.`

B. Barriers to Entry

Because a firm cannot possess monopoly power in a market unless that market is also protected by significant barriers to entry, see supra Section II.A, it follows that a firm cannot threaten to achieve monopoly power in a market unless that market is, or will be, similarly protected. See Spectrum Sports, 506 U.S. at 456 ("In order to determine whether there is a dangerous probability of monopolization, courts have found it necessary to consider ... the defendant's ability to lessen or destroy competition in that market.") (citing cases). Plaintiffs have the burden of establishing barriers to entry into a properly defined relevant market. See 2A PHILLIP E. AREEDA ET AL., ANTITRUST LAW ¶ 420b, at 57-59 (1995); 3A PHILLIP E. AREEDA & HERBERT HOVENKAMP, ANTITRUST LAW ¶ 807g, at 361-62 (1996); see also Neumann v. Reinforced

Earth Co., 786 F.2d 424, 429 (D.C. Cir. 1986). Plaintiffs must not only show that barriers to entry protect the properly defined browser market, but that those barriers are "significant." See United States v. Baker Hughes Inc., 908 F.2d 981, 987 (D.C. Cir. 1990). Whether there are significant barriers to entry cannot, of course, be answered absent an appropriate market definition; thus, plaintiffs' failure on that score alone is dispositive. But even were we to assume a properly defined market, for example browsers consisting of a graphical interface plus internet protocols, plaintiffs nonetheless failed to carry their burden on barriers to entry.

Contrary to plaintiffs' contention on appeal, see Appellees' Br. at 91-93, none of the District Court's statements constitutes a finding of barriers to entry into the web browser market. Finding of Fact 89 states:

> At the time Microsoft presented its proposal, Navigator was the only browser product with a significant share of the market and thus the only one with the potential to weaken the applications barrier to entry. Thus, had it convinced Netscape to accept its offer of a "special relationship," Microsoft quickly would have gained such control over the extensions and standards that network-centric applications (including Web sites) employ as to make it all but impossible for any future browser rival to lure appreciable developer interest away from Microsoft's platform.

This finding is far too speculative to establish that competing browsers would be unable to enter the market, or that Microsoft would have the power to raise the price of its browser above, or reduce the quality of its browser below, the competitive level. Moreover, it is ambiguous insofar as it appears to focus on Microsoft's response to the perceived platform threat rather than the browser market. Finding of Fact 144, on which plaintiffs also rely, is part of the District Court's discussion of Microsoft's alleged anticompetitive actions to eliminate the platform threat posed by Netscape Navigator. This finding simply describes Microsoft's reliance on studies indicating consumers' reluctance to switch browsers, a reluctance not shown to be any more than that which stops consumers from switching brands of cereal. Absent more extensive and definitive factual findings, the District Court's legal conclusions about entry barriers amount to nothing more than speculation.

In contrast to their minimal effort on market definition, plaintiffs did at least offer proposed findings of fact suggesting that the possibility of network effects could potentially create barriers to entry into the browser market. See Plaintiffs' Joint Proposed Findings of Fact, at 822-23, 825-27, reprinted in 2 J.A. at 1485-86, 1488-90. The District Court did not adopt those proposed findings. See Findings of Fact ¶ 89. However, the District Court did acknowledge the possibility of a different kind of entry barrier in its Conclusions of Law:

> In the time it would have taken an aspiring entrant to launch a serious effort to compete against Internet Explorer, Microsoft could have erected the same type of barrier that protects its existing monopoly power by adding proprietary extensions to the browsing software under its control and by extracting commitments from OEMs, IAPs and others similar to the ones discussed in [the monopoly maintenance section].

Conclusions of Law, at 46 (emphasis added).

Giving plaintiffs and the District Court the benefit of the doubt, we might remand if the possible existence of entry barriers resulting from the possible creation and exploitation of network effects in the browser market were the only concern. That is not enough to carry the day, however, because the District Court did not make two key findings: (1) that network effects were a necessary or even probable, rather than merely possible, consequence of high market share in the browser market and (2) that a barrier to entry resulting from network effects would be "significant" enough to confer monopoly power. Again, these deficiencies are in large part traceable to plaintiffs' own failings. As to the first point, the District Court's use of the phrase "could have"

reflects the same uncertainty articulated in testimony cited in plaintiffs' proposed findings. See Plaintiffs' Joint Proposed Findings of Fact, at 822 (citing testimony of Frederick Warren-Boulton), at 826 (citing testimony of Franklin Fisher), reprinted in 2 J.A. at 1485, 1489. As to the second point, the cited testimony in plaintiffs' proposed findings offers little more than conclusory statements. See id. at 822-27, reprinted in 2 J.A. at 1485-90. The proffered testimony contains no evidence regarding the cost of "porting" websites to different browsers or the potentially different economic incentives facing ICPs, as opposed to ISVs, in their decision to incur costs to do so. Simply invoking the phrase "network effects" without pointing to more evidence does not suffice to carry plaintiffs' burden in this respect.

Any doubt that we may have had regarding remand instead of outright reversal on the barriers to entry question was dispelled by plaintiffs' arguments on attempted monopolization before this court. Not only did plaintiffs fail to articulate a website barrier to entry theory in either their brief or at oral argument, they failed to point the court to evidence in the record that would support a finding that Microsoft would likely erect significant barriers to entry upon acquisition of a dominant market share.

Plaintiffs did not devote the same resources to the attempted monopolization claim as they did to the monopoly maintenance claim. But both claims require evidentiary and theoretical rigor. Because plaintiffs failed to make their case on attempted monopolization both in the District Court and before this court, there is no reason to give them a second chance to flesh out a claim that should have been fleshed out the first time around. Accordingly, we reverse the District Court's determination of § 2 liability for attempted monopolization.

IV. TYING

Microsoft also contests the District Court's determination of liability under § 1 of the Sherman Act. The District Court concluded that Microsoft's contractual and technological bundling of the IE web browser (the "tied" product) with its Windows operating system ("OS") (the "tying" product) resulted in a tying arrangement that was per se unlawful. Conclusions of Law, at 47-51. We hold that the rule of reason, rather than per se analysis, should govern the legality of tying arrangements involving platform software products. The Supreme Court has warned that " '[i]t is only after considerable experience with certain business relationships that courts classify them as per se violations....' " Broad. Music, Inc. v. CBS, 441 U.S. 1, 9 (1979) (quoting United States v. Topco Assocs., 405 U.S. 596, 607-08 (1972)). While every "business relationship" will in some sense have unique features, some represent entire, novel categories of dealings. As we shall explain, the arrangement before us is an example of the latter, offering the first up-close look at the technological integration of added functionality into software that serves as a platform for third-party applications. There being no close parallel in prior antitrust cases, simplistic application of per se tying rules carries a serious risk of harm. Accordingly, we vacate the District Court's finding of a per se tying violation and remand the case. Plaintiffs may on remand pursue their tying claim under the rule of reason.

The facts underlying the tying allegation substantially overlap with those set forth in Section II.B in connection with the § 2 monopoly maintenance claim. The key District Court findings are that (1) Microsoft required licensees of Windows 95 and 98 also to license IE as a bundle at a single price, Findings of Fact ¶ ¶ 137, 155, 158; (2) Microsoft refused to allow OEMs to uninstall or remove IE from the Windows desktop, id. ¶ ¶ 158, 203, 213; (3) Microsoft designed Windows 98 in a way that withheld from consumers the ability to remove IE by use of the Add/Remove Programs utility, id. ¶ 170; cf. id. ¶ 165 (stating that IE was subject to Add/Remove Programs utility in Windows 95); and (4) Microsoft designed Windows 98 to override the user's choice of default web browser in certain circumstances, id. ¶ ¶ 171, 172. The court found that these acts constituted a per se tying violation. Conclusions of Law, at 47-51. Although the District Court also found that Microsoft commingled operating system-only and browser-only routines in the same library files, Findings of Fact ¶ ¶ 161, 164, it did not include this as a basis for tying liability despite plaintiffs' request that it do so, Plaintiffs' Proposed Findings of Fact, ¶ ¶ 131-32, reprinted in 2 J.A. at 941-47.

There are four elements to a per se tying violation: (1) the tying and tied goods are two separate products; (2) the defendant has market power in the tying product market; (3) the defendant affords consumers no choice but to purchase the tied product from it; and (4) the tying arrangement forecloses a substantial volume of commerce. See Eastman Kodak Co. v. Image Tech. Servs., Inc., 504 U.S. 451, 461-62 (1992); Jefferson Parish Hosp. Dist. No. 2 v. Hyde, 466 U.S. 2, 12-18 (1984).

Microsoft does not dispute that it bound Windows and IE in the four ways the District Court cited. Instead it argues that Windows (the tying good) and IE browsers (the tied good) are not "separate products," Appellant's Opening Br. at 69-79, and that it did not substantially foreclose competing browsers from the tied product market, id. at 79-83. (Microsoft also contends that it does not have monopoly power in the tying product market, id. at 84-96, but, for reasons given in Section II.A, we uphold the District Court's finding to the contrary.)

We first address the separate-products inquiry, a source of much argument between the parties and of confusion in the cases. Our purpose is to highlight the poor fit between the separate-products test and the facts of this case. We then offer further reasons for carving an exception to the per se rule when the tying product is platform software. In the final section we discuss the District Court's inquiry if plaintiffs pursue a rule of reason claim on remand.

A. Separate-Products Inquiry Under the Per Se Test

The requirement that a practice involve two separate products before being condemned as an illegal tie started as a purely linguistic requirement: unless products are separate, one cannot be "tied" to the other. Indeed, the nature of the products involved in early tying cases—intuitively distinct items such as a movie projector and a film, Motion Picture Patents Co. v. Universal Film Mfg. Co., 243 U.S. 502 (1917)—led courts either to disregard the separate-products question, see, e.g., United Shoe Mach. Corp. v. United States, 258 U.S. 451 (1922), or to discuss it only in passing, see, e.g., Motion Picture Patents, 243 U.S. at 508, 512, 518. It was not until Times-Picayune Publishing Co. v. United States, 345 U.S. 594 (1953), that the separate-products issue became a distinct element of the test for an illegal tie. Id. at 614. Even that case engaged in a rather cursory inquiry into whether ads sold in the morning edition of a paper were a separate product from ads sold in the evening edition.

The first case to give content to the separate-products test was Jefferson Parish, 466 U.S. 2. That case addressed a tying arrangement in which a hospital conditioned surgical care at its facility on the purchase of anesthesiological services from an affiliated medical group. The facts were a challenge for casual separate-products analysis because the tied service—anesthesia—was neither intuitively distinct from nor intuitively contained within the tying service—surgical care. A further complication was that, soon after the Court enunciated the per se rule for tying liability in International Salt Co. v. United States, 332 U.S. 392, 396 (1947), and Northern Pacific Railway Co. v. United States, 356 U.S. 1, 5-7 (1958), new economic research began to cast doubt on the assumption, voiced by the Court when it established the rule, that " 'tying agreements serve hardly any purpose beyond the suppression of competition,' " id. at 6 (quoting Standard Oil of Cal. v. United States, 337 U.S. 293, 305-06 (1949)); see also Jefferson Parish, 466 U.S. at 15 n.23 (citing materials); Fortner Enters. v. U.S. Steel Corp., 394 U.S. 495, 524-25 (1969) (Fortas, J., dissenting) ("Fortner I").

The Jefferson Parish Court resolved the matter in two steps. First, it clarified that "the answer to the question whether one or two products are involved" does not turn "on the functional relation between them...." Jefferson Parish, 466 U.S. at 19; see also id. at 19 n.30. In other words, the mere fact that two items are complements, that "one ... is useless without the other," id., does not make them a single "product" for purposes of tying law. Accord Eastman Kodak, 504 U.S. at 463. Second, reasoning that the "definitional question [whether two distinguishable products are involved] depends on whether the arrangement may have the type of competitive consequences addressed by the rule [against tying]," Jefferson Parish, 466 U.S. at 21, the Court decreed that "no tying arrangement can exist unless there is a sufficient demand for the purchase of anesthesiological services separate from hospital services to identify a distinct product market in which it is efficient to offer anesthesiological services separately from hospital service," id. at 21-22 (emphasis added); accord Eastman Kodak, 504 U.S. at 462.

The Court proceeded to examine direct and indirect evidence of consumer demand for the tied product separate from the tying product. Direct evidence addresses the question whether, when given a choice, consumers purchase the tied good from the tying good maker, or from other firms. The Court took note, for example, of testimony that patients and surgeons often requested specific anesthesiologists not associated with a hospital. Jefferson Parish, 466 U.S. at 22. Indirect evidence includes the behavior of firms without market power in the tying good market, presumably on the notion that (competitive) supply follows demand. If competitive firms always bundle the tying and tied goods, then they are a single product. See id. at 22 n.36; see also Eastman Kodak, 504 U.S. at 462; Fortner I, 394 U.S. at 525 (Fortas, J., dissenting), cited in Jefferson Parish, 466 U.S. at 12, 22 n.35; United States v. Jerrold Elecs. Corp., 187 F. Supp. 545, 559 (E.D. Pa. 1960), aff'd per curiam, 365 U.S. 567 (1961); 10 PHILLIP E. AREEDA ET AL., ANTITRUST LAW ¶ 1744, at 197-201 (1996). Here the Court noted that only 27% of anesthesiologists in markets other than the defendant's had financial relationships with hospitals, and that, unlike radiologists and pathologists, anesthesiologists were not usually employed by hospitals, i.e., bundled with hospital services. Jefferson Parish, 466 U.S. at 22 n.36. With both direct and indirect evidence concurring, the Court determined that hospital surgery and anesthesiological services were distinct goods.

To understand the logic behind the Court's consumer demand test, consider first the postulated harms from tying. The core concern is that tying prevents goods from competing directly for consumer choice on their merits, i.e., being selected as a result of "buyers' independent judgment," id. at 13 (internal quotes omitted). With a tie, a buyer's "freedom to select the best bargain in the second market [could be] impaired by his need to purchase the tying product, and perhaps by an inability to evaluate the true cost of either product...." Id. at 15. Direct competition on the merits of the tied product is foreclosed when the tying product either is sold only in a bundle with the tied product or, though offered separately, is sold at a bundled price, so that the buyer pays the same price whether he takes the tied product or not. In both cases, a consumer buying the tying product becomes entitled to the tied product; he will therefore likely be unwilling to buy a competitor's version of the tied product even if, making his own price/quality assessment, that is what he would prefer.

But not all ties are bad. Bundling obviously saves distribution and consumer transaction costs. 9 PHILLIP E. AREEDA, ANTITRUST LAW ¶ 1703g2, at 51-52 (1991). This is likely to be true, to take some examples from the computer industry, with the integration of math co-processors and memory into microprocessor chips and the inclusion of spell checkers in word processors. 11/10/98 pm Tr. at 18-19 (trial testimony of Steven McGeady of Intel), reprinted in 9 J.A. at 5581-82 (math co-processor); Cal. Computer Prods., Inc. v. IBM Corp., 613 F.2d 727, 744 & n.29 (9th Cir. 1979) (memory). Bundling can also capitalize on certain economies of scope. A possible example is the "shared" library files that perform OS and browser functions with the very same lines of code and thus may save drive space from the clutter of redundant routines and memory when consumers use both the OS and browser simultaneously. 11/16/98 pm Tr. at 44 (trial testimony of Glenn Weadock), reprinted in 9 J.A. at 5892; Direct Testimony of Microsoft's James Allchin ¶ ¶ 10, 97, 100, 106-

116, app. A (excluding ¶ ¶ f, g.vi), reprinted in 5 J.A. at 3292, 3322-30, 3412-17. Indeed, if there were no efficiencies from a tie (including economizing on consumer transaction costs such as the time and effort involved in choice), we would expect distinct consumer demand for each individual component of every good. In a competitive market with zero transaction costs, the computers on which this opinion was written would only be sold piecemeal—keyboard, monitor, mouse, central processing unit, disk drive, and memory all sold in separate transactions and likely by different manufacturers.

Recognizing the potential benefits from tying, see Jefferson Parish, 466 U.S. at 21 n.33, the Court in Jefferson Parish forged a separate-products test that, like those of market power and substantial foreclosure, attempts to screen out false positives under per se analysis. The consumer demand test is a rough proxy for whether a tying arrangement may, on balance, be welfare-enhancing, and unsuited to per se condemnation. In the abstract, of course, there is always direct separate demand for products: assuming choice is available at zero cost, consumers will prefer it to no choice. Only when the efficiencies from bundling are dominated by the benefits to choice for enough consumers, however, will we actually observe consumers making independent purchases. In other words, perceptible separate demand is inversely proportional to net efficiencies. On the supply side, firms without market power will bundle two goods only when the cost savings from joint sale outweigh the value consumers place on separate choice. So bundling by all competitive firms implies strong net efficiencies. If a court finds either that there is no noticeable separate demand for the tied product or, there being no convincing direct evidence of separate demand, that the entire "competitive fringe" engages in the same behavior as the defendant, 10 AREEDA ET AL., ANTITRUST LAW ¶ 1744c4, at 200, then the tying and tied products should be declared one product and per se liability should be rejected.

Before concluding our exegesis of Jefferson Parish's separate-products test, we should clarify two things. First, Jefferson Parish does not endorse a direct inquiry into the efficiencies of a bundle. Rather, it proposes easy-to-administer proxies for net efficiency. In describing the separate-products test we discuss efficiencies only to explain the rationale behind the consumer demand inquiry. To allow the separate-products test to become a detailed inquiry into possible welfare consequences would turn a screening test into the very process it is expected to render unnecessary. 10 AREEDA ET AL., ANTITRUST LAW ¶ ¶ 1741b & c, at 180-85; see also Jefferson Parish, 466 U.S. at 34-35 (O'Connor, J., concurring).

Second, the separate-products test is not a one-sided inquiry into the cost savings from a bundle. Although Jefferson Parish acknowledged that prior lower court cases looked at cost-savings to decide separate products, see id. at 22 n.35, the Court conspicuously did not adopt that approach in its disposition of tying arrangement before it. Instead it chose proxies that balance costs savings against reduction in consumer choice.

With this background, we now turn to the separate-products inquiry before us. The District Court found that many consumers, if given the option, would choose their browser separately from the OS. Findings of Fact ¶ 151 (noting that "corporate consumers ... prefer to standardize on the same browser across different [OSs]" at the workplace). Turning to industry custom, the court found that, although all major OS vendors bundled browsers with their OSs, these companies either sold versions without a browser, or allowed OEMs or end-users either not to install the bundled browser or in any event to "uninstall" it. Id. ¶ 153. The court did not discuss the record evidence as to whether OS vendors other than Microsoft sold at a bundled price, with no discount for a browserless OS, perhaps because the record evidence on the issue was in conflict. Compare, e.g., Direct Testimony of Richard Schmalensee ¶ 241, reprinted in 7 J.A. at 4315 ("[A]ll major operating system vendors do in fact include Web-browsing software with the operating system at no extra charge.") (emphasis added), with, e.g., 1/6/99 pm Tr. at 42 (trial testimony of Franklin Fisher of MIT) (suggesting all OSs but Microsoft offer discounts).

Microsoft does not dispute that many consumers demand alternative browsers. But on industry custom Microsoft contends that no other firm requires non-removal because no other firm has invested the resources to integrate web browsing as deeply into its OS as Microsoft has. Appellant's Opening Br. at 25; cf. Direct Testimony of James Allchin ¶ ¶ 262-72, reprinted in 5 J.A. at 3385-89 (Apple, IBM); 11/5/98 pm Tr. at 55-58 (trial testimony of Apple's Avadis Tevanian, Jr.), reprinted in 9 J.A. at 5507-10 (Apple). (We here use the term "integrate" in the rather simple sense of converting individual goods into components of a single physical object (e.g., a computer as it leaves the OEM, or a disk or sets of disks), without any normative implication that such integration is desirable or achieves special advantages. Cf. United States v. Microsoft Corp., 147 F.3d 935, 950 (D.C. Cir. 1998) ("Microsoft II").) Microsoft contends not only that its integration of IE into Windows is innovative and beneficial but also that it requires non-removal of IE. In our discussion of monopoly maintenance we find that these claims fail the efficiency balancing applicable in that context. But the separate-products analysis is supposed to perform its function as a proxy without embarking on any direct analysis of efficiency. Accordingly, Microsoft's implicit argument—that in this case looking to a competitive fringe is inadequate to evaluate fully its potentially innovative technological integration, that such a comparison is between apples and oranges—poses a legitimate objection to the operation of Jefferson Parish's separate-products test for the per se rule.

In fact there is merit to Microsoft's broader argument that Jefferson Parish's consumer demand test would "chill innovation to the detriment of consumers by preventing firms from integrating into their products new functionality previously provided by standalone products—and hence, by definition, subject to separate consumer demand." Appellant's Opening Br. at 69. The per se rule's direct consumer demand and indirect industry custom inquiries are, as a general matter, backward-looking and therefore systematically poor proxies for overall efficiency in the presence of new and innovative integration. See 10 AREEDA ET AL., ANTITRUST LAW ¶ 1746, at 224-29; Amicus Brief of Lawrence Lessig at 24-25, and sources cited therein (brief submitted regarding Conclusions of Law). The direct consumer demand test focuses on historic consumer behavior, likely before integration, and the indirect industry custom test looks at firms that, unlike the defendant, may not have integrated the tying and tied goods. Both tests compare incomparables—the defendant's decision to bundle in the presence of integration, on the one hand, and consumer and competitor calculations in its absence, on the other. If integration has efficiency benefits, these may be ignored by the Jefferson Parish proxies. Because one cannot be sure beneficial integration will be protected by the other elements of the per se rule, simple application of that rule's separate-products test may make consumers worse off.

In light of the monopoly maintenance section, obviously, we do not find that Microsoft's integration is welfare-enhancing or that it should be absolved of tying liability. Rather, we heed Microsoft's warning that the separate-products element of the per se rule may not give newly integrated products a fair shake.

B. Per Se Analysis Inappropriate for this Case.

We now address directly the larger question as we see it: whether standard per se analysis should be applied "off the shelf" to evaluate the defendant's tying arrangement, one which involves software that serves as a platform for third-party applications. There is no doubt that "[i]t is far too late in the history of our antitrust jurisprudence to question the proposition that certain tying arrangements pose an unacceptable risk of stifling competition and therefore are unreasonable 'per se.' " Jefferson Parish, 466 U.S. at 9 (emphasis added). But there are strong reasons to doubt that the integration of additional software functionality into an OS falls among these arrangements. Applying per se analysis to such an amalgamation creates undue risks of error and of deterring welfare-enhancing innovation.

The Supreme Court has warned that " '[i]t is only after considerable experience with certain business relationships that courts classify them as per se violations....' " Broad. Music, 441 U.S. at 9 (quoting Topco Assocs., 405 U.S. at 607-08); accord Cont'l T.V., Inc. v. GTE Sylvania Inc., 433 U.S. 36, 47-59 (1977); White Motor Co. v. United States, 372 U.S. 253, 263 (1963); Jerrold Elecs., 187 F. Supp. at 555-58, 560-61; see also Frank H. Easterbrook, Allocating Antitrust Decisionmaking Tasks, 76 GEO. L.J. 305, 308 (1987). Yet the sort of tying arrangement attacked here is unlike any the Supreme Court has considered. The early Supreme Court cases on tying dealt with arrangements whereby the sale or lease of a patented product was conditioned on the purchase of certain unpatented products from the patentee. See Motion Picture Patents, 243 U.S. 502 (1917); United Shoe Mach., 258 U.S. 451 (1922); IBM Corp. v. United States, 298 U.S. 131 (1936); Int'l Salt, 332 U.S. 392 (1947). Later Supreme Court tying cases did not involve market power derived from patents, but continued to involve contractual ties. See Times-Picayune, 345 U.S. 594 (1953) (defendant newspaper conditioned the purchase of ads in its evening edition on the purchase of ads in its morning edition); N. Pac. Ry., 356 U.S. 1 (1958) (defendant railroad leased land only on the condition that products manufactured on the land be shipped on its railways); United States v. Loew's Inc., 371 U.S. 38 (1962) (defendant distributor of copyrighted feature films conditioned the sale of desired films on the purchase of undesired films); U.S. Steel Corp. v. Fortner Enters., Inc., 429 U.S. 610 (1977) ("Fortner II") (defendant steel company conditioned access to low interest loans on the purchase of the defendant's prefabricated homes); Jefferson Parish, 466 U.S. 2 (1984) (defendant hospital conditioned use of its operating rooms on the purchase of anesthesiological services from a medical group associated with the hospital); Eastman Kodak, 504 U.S. 451 (1992) (defendant photocopying machine manufacturer conditioned the sale of replacement parts for its machines on the use of the defendant's repair services).

In none of these cases was the tied good physically and technologically integrated with the tying good. Nor did the defendants ever argue that their tie improved the value of the tying product to users and to makers of complementary goods. In those cases where the defendant claimed that use of the tied good made the tying good more valuable to users, the Court ruled that the same result could be achieved via quality standards for substitutes of the tied good. See, e.g., Int'l Salt, 332 U.S. at 397-98; IBM, 298 U.S. at 138-40. Here Microsoft argues that IE and Windows are an integrated physical product and that the bundling of IE APIs with Windows makes the latter a better applications platform for third-party software. It is unclear how the benefits from IE APIs could be achieved by quality standards for different browser manufacturers. We do not pass judgment on Microsoft's claims regarding the benefits from integration of its APIs. We merely note that these and other novel, purported efficiencies suggest that judicial "experience" provides little basis for believing that, "because of their pernicious effect on competition and lack of any redeeming virtue," a software firm's decisions to sell multiple functionalities as a package should be "conclusively presumed to be unreasonable and therefore illegal without elaborate inquiry as to the precise harm they have caused or the business excuse for their use." N. Pac. Ry., 356 U.S. at 5 (emphasis added).

Nor have we found much insight into software integration among the decisions of lower federal courts. Most tying cases in the computer industry involve bundling with hardware. See, e.g., Digital Equip. Corp. v. Uniq Digital Techs., Inc., 73 F.3d 756, 761 (7th Cir. 1996) (Easterbrook, J.) (rejecting with little discussion the notion that bundling of OS with a computer is a tie of two separate products); Datagate, Inc. v. Hewlett-Packard Co., 941 F.2d 864, 870 (9th Cir. 1991) (holding that plaintiff's allegation that defendant conditioned its software on purchase of its hardware was sufficient to survive summary judgment); Digidyne Corp. v. Data Gen. Corp., 734 F.2d 1336, 1341-47 (9th Cir. 1984) (holding that defendant's conditioning the sale of its OS on the purchase of its CPU constitutes a per se tying violation); Cal. Computer Prods., 613 F.2d at 743-44 (holding that defendant's integration into its CPU of a disk controller designed for its own disk drives was a useful innovation and not an impermissible attempt to monopolize); ILC Peripherals Leasing Corp. v. IBM Corp., 448 F. Supp. 228, 233 (N.D. Cal. 1978) (finding that defendant's integration of magnetic disks and a head/disk assembly was not an unlawful tie), aff'd per curiam sub. nom. Memorex Corp. v. IBM Corp., 636 F.2d 1188 (9th Cir. 1980); see also Transamerica Computer Co. v. IBM Corp., 698 F.2d 1377, 1382-83 (9th Cir. 1983) (finding lawful defendant's design changes that rendered plaintiff peripheral maker's tape drives incompatible with the defendant's CPU). The hardware case that most resembles the present one is Telex Corp. v. IBM Corp., 367 F. Supp. 258 (N.D. Okla. 1973), rev'd on other grounds, 510 F.2d 894 (10th Cir. 1975). Just as Microsoft integrated web browsing into its OS, IBM in the 1970s integrated memory into its CPUs, a hardware platform. A peripheral manufacturer alleged a tying violation, but the District Court dismissed the claim because it thought it inappropriate to enmesh the courts in product design decisions. Id. at 347. The court's discussion of the tying claim was brief and did not dwell on the effects of the integration on competition or efficiencies. Nor did the court consider whether per se analysis of the alleged tie was wise.

We have found four antitrust cases involving arrangements in which a software program is tied to the purchase of a software platform—two district court cases and two appellate court cases, including one from this court. The first case, Innovation Data Processing, Inc. v. IBM Corp., 585 F. Supp. 1470 (D.N.J. 1984), involved an allegation that IBM bundled with its OS a utility used to transfer data from a tape drive to a computer's disk drive. Although the court mentioned the efficiencies achieved by bundling, it ultimately dismissed the per se tying claim because IBM sold a discounted version of the OS without the utility. Id. at 1475-76. The second case, A.I. Root Co. v. Computer/Dynamics, Inc., 806 F.2d 673 (6th Cir. 1986), was brought by a business customer who claimed that an OS manufacturer illegally conditioned the sale of its OS on the purchase of other software applications. The court quickly disposed of the case on the ground that defendant Computer/Dynamics had no market power. Id. at 675-77. There was no mention of the efficiencies from the tie. The third case, Caldera, Inc. v. Microsoft Corp., 72 F. Supp. 2d 1295 (D. Utah 1999), involved a complaint that the technological integration of MS-DOS and Windows 3.1 into Windows 95 constituted a per se tying violation. The court formulated the "single product" issue in terms of whether the tie constituted a technological improvement, ultimately concluding that Microsoft was not entitled to summary judgment on that issue. Id. at 1322-28.

The software case that bears the greatest resemblance to that at bar is, not surprisingly, Microsoft II, 147 F.3d 935, where we examined the bundling of IE with Windows 95. But the issue there was whether the bundle constituted an "integrated product" as the term was used in a 1994 consent decree between the Department of Justice and Microsoft. Id. at 939. We did not consider whether Microsoft's bundling should be condemned as per se illegal. We certainly did not make any finding that bundling IE with Windows had "no purpose except stifling of competition," White Motor, 372 U.S. at 263, an important consideration in defining the scope of any of antitrust law's per se rules, see Cont'l T.V., 433 U.S. at 57-59. While we believed our interpretation of the term "integrated product" was consistent with the test for separate products under tying law, we made clear that the "antitrust question is of course distinct." Microsoft II, 147 F.3d at 950 n.14. We even cautioned that our conclusion that IE and Windows 95 were integrated was "subject to reexamination on a more complete record." Id. at 952. To the extent that the decision completely disclaimed judicial capacity to evaluate "high-tech product design," id., it cannot be said to conform to prevailing antitrust doctrine (as opposed to resolution of the decree-interpretation issue then before us). In any case, mere review of asserted breaches of a consent decree hardly constitutes enough "experience" to warrant application of per se analysis. See Broad. Music, 441 U.S. at 10-16 (refusing to apply per se analysis to defendant's blanket licenses even though those licenses had been thoroughly investigated by the Department of Justice and were the subject of a consent decree that had been reviewed by numerous courts).

While the paucity of cases examining software bundling suggests a high risk that per se analysis may produce inaccurate results, the nature of the platform software market affirmatively suggests that per se rules might stunt valuable innovation. We have in mind two reasons.

First, as we explained in the previous section, the separate-products test is a poor proxy for net efficiency from newly integrated products. Under per se analysis the first firm to merge previously distinct functionalities (e.g., the inclusion of starter motors in automobiles) or to eliminate entirely the need for a second function (e.g., the invention of the stain-resistant carpet) risks being condemned as having tied two separate products because at the moment of integration there will appear to be a robust "distinct" market for the tied product. See 10 AREEDA ET AL., ANTITRUST LAW ¶ 1746, at 224. Rule of reason analysis, however, affords the first mover an opportunity to demonstrate that an efficiency gain from its "tie" adequately offsets any distortion of consumer choice. See Grappone, Inc. v. Subaru of New England, Inc., 858 F.2d 792, 799 (1st Cir. 1988) (Breyer, J.); see also Town Sound & Custom Tops, Inc. v. Chrysler Motor Corp., 959 F.2d 468, 482 (3d Cir. 1992); Kaiser Aluminum & Chem. Sales, Inc. v. Avondale Shipyards, Inc., 677 F.2d 1045, 1048-49 n.5 (5th Cir. 1982).

The failure of the separate-products test to screen out certain cases of productive integration is particularly troubling in platform software markets such as that in which the defendant competes. Not only is integration common in such markets, but it is common among firms without market power. We have already reviewed evidence that nearly all competitive OS vendors also bundle browsers. Moreover, plaintiffs do not dispute that OS vendors can and do incorporate basic internet plumbing and other useful functionality into their OSs. See Direct Testimony of Richard Schmalensee ¶ 508, reprinted in 7 J.A. at 4462-64 (disk defragmentation, memory management, peer-to-peer networking or file sharing); 11/19/98 am Tr. at 82-83 (trial testimony of Frederick Warren-Boulton), reprinted in 10 J.A. at 6427-28 (TCP/IP stacks). Firms without market power have no incentive to package different pieces of software together unless there are efficiency gains from doing so. The ubiquity of bundling in competitive platform software markets should give courts reason to pause before condemning such behavior in less competitive markets.

Second, because of the pervasively innovative character of platform software markets, tying in such markets may produce efficiencies that courts have not previously encountered and thus the Supreme Court had not factored into the per se rule as originally conceived. For example, the bundling of a browser with OSs enables an independent software developer to count on the presence of the browser's APIs, if any, on consumers' machines and thus to omit them from its own package. See Direct Testimony of Richard Schmalensee ¶ ¶ 230-31, 234, reprinted in 7 J.A. at 4309-11, 4312; Direct Testimony of Michael Devlin ¶ ¶ 12-21, reprinted in 5 J.A. at 3525-29; see also Findings of Fact ¶ 2. It is true that software developers can bundle the browser APIs they need with their own products, see id. ¶ 193, but that may force consumers to pay twice for the same API if it is bundled with two different software programs. It is also true that OEMs can include APIs with the computers they sell, id., but diffusion of uniform APIs by that route may be inferior. First, many OEMs serve special subsets of Windows consumers, such as home or corporate or academic users. If just one of these OEMs decides not to bundle an API because it does not benefit enough of its clients, ISVs that use that API might have to bundle it with every copy of their program. Second, there may be a substantial lag before all OEMs bundle the same set of APIs—a lag inevitably aggravated by the first phenomenon. In a field where programs change very rapidly, delays in the spread of a necessary element (here, the APIs) may be very costly. Of course, these arguments may not justify Microsoft's decision to bundle APIs in this case, particularly because Microsoft did not merely bundle with Windows the APIs from IE, but an entire browser application (sometimes even without APIs, see id.).

A justification for bundling a component of software may not be one for bundling the entire software package, especially given the malleability of software code. See id. ¶ ¶ 162-63; 12/9/98 am Tr. at 17 (trial testimony of David Farber); 1/6/99 am Tr. at 6-7 (trial testimony of Franklin Fisher), reprinted in 11 J.A. at 7192-93; Direct Testimony of Joachim Kempin ¶ 286, reprinted in 6 J.A. at 3749. Furthermore, the interest in efficient API diffusion obviously supplies a far stronger justification for simple price-bundling than for Microsoft's contractual or technological bars to subsequent removal of functionality. But our qualms about redefining the boundaries of a defendant's product and the possibility of consumer gains from simplifying the work of applications developers makes us question any hard and fast approach to tying in OS software markets.

There may also be a number of efficiencies that, although very real, have been ignored in the calculations underlying the adoption of a per se rule for tying. We fear that these efficiencies are common in technologically dynamic markets where product development is especially unlikely to follow an easily foreseen linear pattern. Take the following example from ILC Peripherals, 448 F. Supp. 228, a case concerning the evolution of disk drives for computers. When IBM first introduced such drives in 1956, it sold an integrated product that contained magnetic disks and disk heads that read and wrote data onto disks. Id. at 231. Consumers of the drives demanded two functions—to store data and to access it all at once. In the first few years consumers' demand for storage increased rapidly, outpacing the evolution of magnetic disk technology. To satisfy that demand IBM made it possible for consumers to remove the magnetic disks from drives, even though that meant consumers would not have access to data on disks removed from the drive. This componentization enabled makers of computer peripherals to sell consumers removable disks. Id. at 231-32. Over time, however, the technology of magnetic disks caught up with demand for capacity, so that consumers needed few removable disks to store all their data. At this point IBM reintegrated disks into their drives, enabling consumers to once again have immediate access to all their data without a sacrifice in capacity. Id. A manufacturer of removable disks sued. But the District Court found the tie justified because it satisfied consumer demand for immediate access to all data, and ruled that disks and disk heads were one product. Id. at 233. A court hewing more closely to the truncated analysis contemplated by Northern Pacific Railway would perhaps have overlooked these consumer benefits.

These arguments all point to one conclusion: we cannot comfortably say that bundling in platform software markets has so little "redeeming virtue," N. Pac. Ry., 356 U.S. at 5, and that there would be so "very little loss to society" from its ban, that "an inquiry into its costs in the individual case [can be] considered [ ] unnecessary." Jefferson Parish, 466 U.S. at 33-34 (O'Connor, J., concurring). We do not have enough empirical evidence regarding the effect of Microsoft's practice on the amount of consumer surplus created or consumer choice foreclosed by the integration of added functionality into platform software to exercise sensible judgment regarding that entire class of behavior. (For some issues we have no data.) "We need to know more than we do about the actual impact of these arrangements on competition to decide whether they ... should be classified as per se violations of the Sherman Act." White Motor, 372 U.S. at 263. Until then, we will heed the wisdom that "easy labels do not always supply ready answers," Broad. Music, 441 U.S. at 8, and vacate the District Court's finding of per se tying liability under Sherman Act § 1. We remand the case for evaluation of Microsoft's tying arrangements under the rule of reason. See Pullman-Standard v. Swint, 456 U.S. 273, 292 (1982) ("[W]here findings are infirm because of an erroneous view of the law, a remand is the proper course unless the record permits only one resolution of the factual issue."). That rule more freely permits consideration of the benefits of bundling in software markets, particularly those for OSs, and a balancing of these benefits against the costs to consumers whose ability to make direct price/quality tradeoffs in the tied market may have been impaired. See Jefferson Parish, 466 U.S. at 25 nn.41-42 (noting that per se rule does not broadly permit consideration of procompetitive justifications); id. at 34-35 (O'Connor, J., concurring); N. Pac. Ry., 356 U.S. at 5.

Our judgment regarding the comparative merits of the per se rule and the rule of reason is confined to the tying arrangement before us, where the tying product is software whose major purpose is to serve as a platform for third-party applications and the tied product is complementary software functionality. While our reasoning may at times appear to have broader force, we do not have the confidence to speak to facts outside the record, which contains scant discussion of software integration generally. Microsoft's primary justification for bundling IE APIs is that their inclusion with Windows increases the value of third-party software (and Windows) to consumers. See Appellant's Opening Br. at 41-43. Because this claim applies with distinct force when the tying product is platform software, we have no present basis for finding the per se rule inapplicable to software markets generally. Nor should we be interpreted as setting a precedent for switching to the rule of reason every time a court identifies an efficiency justification for a tying arrangement. Our reading of the record suggests merely that integration of new functionality into platform software is a common practice and that wooden application of per se rules in this litigation may cast a cloud over platform innovation in the market for PCs, network computers and information appliances.

C. On Remand

Should plaintiffs choose to pursue a tying claim under the rule of reason, we note the following for the benefit of the trial court:

First, on remand, plaintiffs must show that Microsoft's conduct unreasonably restrained competition. Meeting that burden "involves an inquiry into the actual effect" of Microsoft's conduct on competition in the tied good market, Jefferson Parish, 466 U.S. at 29, the putative market for browsers. To the extent that certain aspects of tying injury may depend on a careful definition of the tied good market and a showing of barriers to entry other than the tying arrangement itself, plaintiffs would have to establish these points. See Jefferson Parish, 466 U.S. at 29 ("This competition [among anesthesiologists] takes place in a market that has not been defined."); id. at 29 n.48 ("[N]either the District Court nor the Court of Appeals made any findings concerning the contract's effect on entry barriers."). But plaintiffs were required—and had every incentive—to provide both a definition of the browser market and barriers to entry to that market as part of their § 2 attempted monopolization claim; yet they failed to do so. See supra Section III. Accordingly, on remand of the § 1 tying claim, plaintiffs will be precluded from arguing any theory of harm that depends on a precise definition of browsers or barriers to entry (for example, network effects from Internet protocols and extensions embedded in a browser) other than what may be implicit in Microsoft's tying arrangement.

Of the harms left, plaintiffs must show that Microsoft's conduct was, on balance, anticompetitive. Microsoft may of course offer procompetitive justifications, and it is plaintiffs' burden to show that the anticompetitive effect of the conduct outweighs its benefit.

Second, the fact that we have already considered some of the behavior plaintiffs allege to constitute tying violations in the monopoly maintenance section does not resolve the § 1 inquiry. The two practices that plaintiffs have most ardently claimed as tying violations are, indeed, a basis for liability under plaintiffs' § 2 monopoly maintenance claim. These are Microsoft's refusal to allow OEMs to uninstall IE or remove it from the Windows desktop, Findings of Fact ¶ ¶ 158, 203, 213, and its removal of the IE entry from the Add/Remove Programs utility in Windows 98, id. ¶ 170. See supra Section II.B. In order for the District Court to conclude these practices also constitute § 1 tying violations, plaintiffs must demonstrate that their benefits—if any, see supra Sections II.B.1.b and II.B.2.b; Findings of Fact ¶ ¶ 176, 186, 193—are outweighed by the harms in the tied product market. See Jefferson Parish, 466 U.S. at 29. If the District Court is convinced of net harm, it must then consider whether any additional remedy is necessary.

In Section II.B we also considered another alleged tying violation—the Windows 98 override of a consumer's choice of default web browser. We concluded that this behavior does not provide a distinct basis for § 2 liability because plaintiffs failed to rebut Microsoft's proffered justification by demonstrating that harms in the operating system market outweigh Microsoft's claimed benefits. See supra Section II.B. On remand, however, although Microsoft may offer the same procompetitive justification for the override, plaintiffs must have a new opportunity to rebut this claim, by demonstrating that the anticompetitive effect in the browser market is greater than these benefits.

Finally, the District Court must also consider an alleged tying violation that we did not consider under § 2 monopoly maintenance: price bundling. First, the court must determine if Microsoft indeed price bundled—that is, was Microsoft's charge for Windows and IE higher than its charge would have been for Windows alone? This will require plaintiffs to resolve the tension between Findings of Fact ¶ ¶ 136-37, which Microsoft interprets as saying that no part of the bundled price of Windows can be attributed to IE, and Conclusions of Law, at 50, which says the opposite. Compare Direct Testimony of Paul Maritz ¶ ¶ 37, 296, reprinted in 6 J.A. at 3656, 3753-54 (Microsoft did not "charge separately" for IE, but like all other major OS vendors included browsing software at "no extra charge"), with GX 202 at MS7 004343, esp. 004347, reprinted in 22 J.A. at 14459, esp. 14463 (memo from Christian Wildfeuer describing focus group test used to price Windows 98 with IE 4), and GX 1371 at MS7 003729-30, 003746, 003748, esp. 003750, reprinted in 15 J.A. at 10306-07, 10323, 10325, esp. 10327 (Windows 98 pricing and marketing memo), and Findings of Fact ¶ 63 (identifying GX 202 as the basis for Windows 98 pricing).

If there is a positive price increment in Windows associated with IE (we know there is no claim of price predation), plaintiffs must demonstrate that the anticompetitive effects of Microsoft's price bundling outweigh any procompetitive justifications the company provides for it. In striking this balance, the District Court should consider, among other things, indirect evidence of efficiency provided by "the competitive fringe." See supra Section IV.A. Although this inquiry may overlap with the separate-products screen under the per se rule, that is not its role here. Because courts applying the rule of reason are free to look at both direct and indirect evidence of efficiencies from a tie, there is no need for a screening device as such; thus the separate-products inquiry serves merely to classify arrangements as subject to tying law, as opposed to, say, liability for exclusive dealing. See Times-Picayune, 345 U.S. at 614 (finding a single product and then turning to a general rule of reason analysis under § 1, though not using the term "tying"); Foster v. Md. State Sav. & Loan Ass'n, 590 F.2d 928, 931, 933 (D.C. Cir. 1978), cited in Jefferson Parish, 466 U.S. at 40 (O'Connor, J., concurring) (same); see also Chawla v. Shell Oil Co., 75 F. Supp. 2d 626, 635, 643-44 (S.D. Tex. 1999) (considering a rule of reason tying claim after finding a single product under the per se rule); Montgomery County Ass'n of Realtors v. Realty Photo Master Corp., 783 F. Supp. 952, 961 & n.26 (D. Md. 1992), aff'd mem. 993 F.2d 1538 (4th Cir. 1993) (same).

If OS vendors without market power also sell their software bundled with a browser, the natural inference is that sale of the items as a bundle serves consumer demand and that unbundled sale would not, for otherwise a competitor could profitably offer the two products separately and capture sales of the tying good from vendors that bundle. See 10 AREEDA ET AL., ANTITRUST LAW ¶ 1744b, at 197-98. It does appear that most if not all firms have sold a browser with their OSs at a bundled price, beginning with IBM and its OS/2 Warp OS in September 1994, Findings of Fact ¶ 140; see also Direct Testimony of Richard Schmalensee ¶ 212, reprinted in 7 J.A. at 4300-01, and running to current versions of Apple's Mac OS, Caldera and Red Hat's Linux OS, Sun's Solaris OS, Be's BeOS, Santa Cruz Operation's UnixWare, Novell's NetWare OS, and others, see Findings of Fact ¶ 153; Direct Testimony of Richard Schmalensee ¶ ¶ 215-23, 230, esp. table 5, reprinted in 7 J.A. at 4302-05, 4310; Direct Testimony of James Allchin ¶ ¶ 261-77, reprinted in 5 J.A. at 3384-92.

Of course price bundling by competitive OS makers would tend to exonerate Microsoft only if the sellers in question sold their browser/OS combinations exclusively at a bundled price. If a competitive seller offers a discount for a browserless version, then—at least as to its OS and browser—the gains from bundling are outweighed by those from separate choice. The evidence on discounts appears to be in conflict. Compare Direct Testimony of Richard Schmalensee ¶ 241, reprinted in 7 J.A. at 4315, with 1/6/99 pm Tr. at 42 (trial testimony of Franklin Fisher). If Schmalensee is correct that nearly all OS makers do not offer a discount, then the harm from tying—obstruction of direct consumer choice—would be theoretically created by virtually all sellers: a customer who would prefer an alternate browser is forced to pay the full price of that browser even though its value to him is only the increment in value over the bundled browser. (The result is similar to that from non-removal, which forces consumers who want the alternate browser to surrender disk space taken up by the unused, bundled browser.) If the failure to offer a price discount were universal, any impediment to direct consumer choice created by Microsoft's price-bundled sale of IE with Windows would be matched throughout the market; yet these OS suppliers on the competitive fringe would have evidently found this price bundling on balance efficient. If Schmalensee's assertions are ill-founded, of course, no such inference could be drawn.

V. Trial Proceedings and Remedy

Microsoft additionally challenges the District Court's procedural rulings on two fronts. First, with respect to the trial phase, Microsoft proposes that the court mismanaged its docket by adopting an expedited trial schedule and receiving evidence through summary witnesses. Second, with respect to the remedies decree, Microsoft argues that the court improperly ordered that it be divided into two separate companies. Only the latter claim will long detain us. The District Court's trial-phase procedures were comfortably within the bounds of its broad discretion to conduct trials as it sees fit. We conclude, however, that the District Court's remedies decree must be vacated for three independent reasons: (1) the court failed to hold a remedies-specific evidentiary hearing when there were disputed facts; (2) the court failed to provide adequate reasons for its decreed remedies; and (3) this Court has revised the scope of Microsoft's liability and it is impossible to determine to what extent that should affect the remedies provisions.

A. Factual Background

On April 3, 2000, the District Court concluded the liability phase of the proceedings by the filing of its Conclusions of Law holding that Microsoft had violated §§ 1 and 2 of the Sherman Act. The court and the parties then began discussions of the procedures to be followed in the imposition of remedies. Initially, the District Court signaled that it would enter relief only after conducting a new round of proceedings. In its Conclusions of Law, the court stated that it would issue a remedies order "following proceedings to be established by further Order of the Court." Conclusions of Law, at 57. And, when during a post-trial conference, Microsoft's counsel asked whether the court "contemplate[d] further proceedings," the judge replied, "Yes. Yes. I assume that there would be further proceedings." 4/4/00 Tr. at 8-9, 11, reprinted in 4 J.A. at 2445-46, 2448. The District Court further speculated that those proceedings might "replicate the procedure at trial with testimony in written form subject to cross-examination." Id. at 11, reprinted in 4 J.A. at 2448.

On April 28, 2000, plaintiffs submitted their proposed final judgment, accompanied by six new supporting affidavits and several exhibits. In addition to a series of temporary conduct restrictions, plaintiffs proposed that Microsoft be split into two independent corporations, with one continuing Microsoft's operating systems business and the other undertaking the balance of Microsoft's operations. Plaintiffs' Proposed Final Judgment at 2-3, reprinted in 4 J.A. at 2473-74. Microsoft filed a "summary response" on May 10, contending both that the proposed decree was too severe and that it would be impossible to resolve certain remedies-specific factual disputes "on a highly expedited basis." Defendant's Summary

Response at 6-7, reprinted in 4 J.A. at 2587-88. Another May 10 submission argued that if the District Court considered imposing plaintiffs' proposed remedy, "then substantial discovery, adequate time for preparation and a full trial on relief will be required." Defendant's Position as to Future Proceedings at 2, reprinted in 4 J.A. at 2646.

After the District Court revealed during a May 24 hearing that it was prepared to enter a decree without conducting "any further process," 5/24/00 pm Tr. at 33, reprinted in 14 J.A. at 9866, Microsoft renewed its argument that the underlying factual disputes between the parties necessitated a remedies-specific evidentiary hearing. In two separate offers of proof, Microsoft offered to produce a number of pieces of evidence, including the following:

- Testimony from Dr. Robert Crandall, a Senior Fellow at the Brookings Institution, that divestiture and dissolution orders historically have "failed to improve economic welfare by reducing prices or increasing output." Defendant's Offer of Proof at 2, reprinted in 4 J.A. at 2743.

- Testimony from Professor Kenneth Elzinga, Professor of Economics at the University of Virginia, that plaintiffs' proposed remedies would not induce entry into the operating systems market. Id. at 4, reprinted in 4 J.A. at 2745.

- Testimony from Dean Richard Schmalensee, Dean of MIT's Sloan School of Management, that dividing Microsoft likely would "harm consumers through higher prices, lower output, reduced efficiency, and less innovation" and would "produce immediate, substantial increases in the prices of both Windows and Office." Id. at 8, reprinted in 4 J.A. at 2749. Indeed, it would cause the price of Windows to triple. Id.

- Testimony from Goldman, Sachs & Co. and from Morgan Stanley Dean Witter that dissolution would adversely affect shareholder value. Id. at 17, 19, reprinted in 4 J.A. at 2758, 2760.

- Testimony from Microsoft Chairman Bill Gates that dividing Microsoft "along the arbitrary lines proposed by the Government" would devastate the company's proposed Next Generation Windows Services platform, which would allow software developers to write web-based applications that users could access from a wide range of devices. Id. at 21-22, reprinted in 4 J.A. at 2762-63.

- Testimony from Steve Ballmer, Microsoft's President and CEO, that Microsoft is organized as a unified company and that "there are no natural lines along which Microsoft could be broken up without causing serious problems." Id. at 23, reprinted in 4 J.A. at 2764.

- Testimony from Michael Capellas, CEO of Compaq, that splitting Microsoft in two "will make it more difficult for OEMs to provide customers with the tightly integrated product offerings they demand" in part because "complementary products created by unrelated companies do not work as well together as products created by a single company." Defendant's Supplemental Offer of Proof at 2, reprinted in 4 J.A. at 2823.

Over Microsoft's objections, the District Court proceeded to consider the merits of the remedy and on June 7, 2000 entered its final judgment. The court explained that it would not conduct "extended proceedings on the form a remedy should take," because it doubted that an evidentiary hearing would "give any significantly greater assurance that it will be able to identify what might be generally regarded as an optimum remedy." Final Judgment, at 62. The bulk of Microsoft's proffered facts were simply conjectures about future events, and "[i]n its experience the Court has found testimonial predictions of future events generally less reliable even than testimony as to historical fact, and cross-examination to be of little use in enhancing or detracting from their accuracy." Id. Nor was the court swayed by Microsoft's "profession of surprise" at the possibility of structural relief. Id. at 61. "From the inception of this case Microsoft knew, from well-established Supreme Court precedents dating from the beginning of the last century, that a mandated divestiture was a possibility, if not a probability, in the event of an adverse result at trial." Id.

The substance of the District Court's remedies order is nearly identical to plaintiffs' proposal. The decree's centerpiece is the requirement that Microsoft submit a proposed plan of divestiture, with the company to be split into an "Operating Systems Business," or "OpsCo," and an "Applications Business," or "AppsCo." Final Judgment, Decree §§ 1.a, l.c.i, at 64. OpsCo would receive all of Microsoft's operating systems, such as Windows 98 and Windows 2000, while AppsCo would receive the remainder of Microsoft's businesses, including IE and Office. The District Court identified four reasons for its "reluctant[ ]" conclusion that "a structural remedy has become imperative." Id. at 62. First, Microsoft "does not yet concede that any of its business practices violated the Sherman Act." Id. Second, the company consequently "continues to do business as it has in the past." Id. Third, Microsoft "has proved untrustworthy in the past." Id. And fourth, the Government, whose officials "are by reason of office obliged and expected to consider—and to act in—the public interest," won the case, "and for that reason alone have some entitlement to a remedy of their choice." Id. at 62-63.

The decree also contains a number of interim restrictions on Microsoft's conduct. For instance, Decree § 3.b requires Microsoft to disclose to third-party developers the APIs and other technical information necessary to ensure that software effectively interoperates with Windows. Id. at 67. "To facilitate compliance," § 3.b further requires that Microsoft establish "a secure facility" at which third-party representatives may "study, interrogate and interact with relevant and necessary portions of [Microsoft platform software] source code." Id. Section 3.e, entitled "Ban on Exclusive Dealing," forbids Microsoft from entering contracts which oblige third parties to restrict their "development, production, distribution, promotion or use of, or payment for" non-Microsoft platform-level software. Id. at 68. Under Decree § 3.f—"Ban on Contractual Tying"—the company may not condition its grant of a Windows license on a party's agreement "to license, promote, or distribute any other Microsoft software product." Id. And § 3.g imposes a "Restriction on Binding Middleware Products to Operating System Products" unless Microsoft also offers consumers "an otherwise identical version" of the operating system without the middleware. Id.

B. Trial Proceedings

Microsoft's first contention—that the District Court erred by adopting an expedited trial schedule and receiving evidence through summary witnesses—is easily disposed of. Trial courts have extraordinarily broad discretion to determine the manner in which they will conduct trials. "This is particularly true in a case such as the one at bar where the proceedings are being tried to the court without a jury." Eli Lilly & Co., Inc. v. Generix Drug Sales, Inc., 460 F.2d 1096, 1105 (5th Cir. 1972). In such cases, "[a]n appellate court will not interfere with the trial court's exercise of its discretion to control its docket and dispatch its business ... except upon the clearest showing that the procedures have resulted in actual and substantial prejudice to the complaining litigant." Id. Microsoft fails to clear this high hurdle. Although the company claims that setting an early trial date inhibited its ability to conduct discovery, it never identified a specific deposition or document it was unable to obtain. And while Microsoft now argues that the use of summary witnesses made inevitable the improper introduction of hearsay evidence, the company actually agreed to the District Court's proposal to limit each side to 12 summary witnesses. 12/2/98 am Tr. at 11, reprinted in 21 J.A. at 14083 (court admonishing Microsoft's counsel to "[k]eep in mind that both sides agreed to the number of witnesses"). Even absent Microsoft's agreement, the company's challenge fails to show that this use of summary witnesses falls outside the trial court's wide latitude to receive evidence as it sees fit. General Elec. Co. v. Joiner, 522 U.S. 136, 141-42 (1997). This is particularly true given the presumption that a judge who conducts a bench trial has ignored any inadmissible evidence, Harris v. Rivera, 454 U.S. 339, 346 (1981)—a presumption that Microsoft makes no serious attempt to overcome. Indeed, under appropriate circumstances with appropriate instructions, we have in the past approved the use of summary witnesses even in jury trials. See, e.g., United States v. Lemire, 720 F.2d 1327 (D.C. Cir. 1983). Therefore, neither the use of the summary witnesses nor any other aspect of the District Court's conduct of the trial phase amounted to an abuse of discretion.

C. Failure to Hold an Evidentiary Hearing

The District Court's remedies-phase proceedings are a different matter. It is a cardinal principle of our system of justice that factual disputes must be heard in open court and resolved through trial-like evidentiary proceedings. Any other course would be contrary "to the spirit which imbues our judicial tribunals prohibiting decision without hearing." Sims v. Greene, 161 F.2d 87, 88 (3d Cir. 1947).

A party has the right to judicial resolution of disputed facts not just as to the liability phase, but also as to appropriate relief. "Normally, an evidentiary hearing is required before an injunction may be granted." United States v. McGee, 714 F.2d 607, 613 (6th Cir. 1983); see also Charlton v. Estate of Charlton, 841 F.2d 988, 989 (9th Cir. 1988) ("Generally the entry or continuation of an injunction requires a hearing. Only when the facts are not in dispute, or when the adverse party has waived its right to a hearing, can that significant procedural step be eliminated." (citation and internal quotation marks omitted)). Other than a temporary restraining order, no injunctive relief may be entered without a hearing. See generally FED. R. CIV. P. 65. A hearing on the merits—i.e., a trial on liability—does not substitute for a relief-specific evidentiary hearing unless the matter of relief was part of the trial on liability, or unless there are no disputed factual issues regarding the matter of relief.

This rule is no less applicable in antitrust cases. The Supreme Court "has recognized that a 'full exploration of facts is usually necessary in order (for the District Court) properly to draw (an antitrust) decree' so as 'to prevent future violations and eradicate existing evils.' " United States

v. Ward Baking Co., 376 U.S. 327, 330-31 (1964) (quoting Associated Press v. United States, 326 U.S. 1, 22 (1945)). Hence a remedies decree must be vacated whenever there is "a bona fide disagreement concerning substantive items of relief which could be resolved only by trial." Id. at 334; cf. Sims, 161 F.2d at 89 ("It has never been supposed that a temporary injunction could issue under the Clayton Act without giving the party against whom the injunction was sought an opportunity to present evidence on his behalf.").

Despite plaintiffs' protestations, there can be no serious doubt that the parties disputed a number of facts during the remedies phase. In two separate offers of proof, Microsoft identified 23 witnesses who, had they been permitted to testify, would have challenged a wide range of plaintiffs' factual representations, including the feasibility of dividing Microsoft, the likely impact on consumers, and the effect of divestiture on shareholders. To take but two examples, where plaintiffs' economists testified that splitting Microsoft in two would be socially beneficial, the company offered to prove that the proposed remedy would "cause substantial social harm by raising software prices, lowering rates of innovation and disrupting the evolution of Windows as a software development platform." Defendant's Offer of Proof at 6, reprinted in 4 J.A. at 2747. And where plaintiffs' investment banking experts proposed that divestiture might actually increase shareholder value, Microsoft proffered evidence that structural relief "would inevitably result in a significant loss of shareholder value," a loss that could reach "tens—possibly hundreds—of billions of dollars." Id. at 19, reprinted in 4 J.A. at 2760.

Indeed, the District Court itself appears to have conceded the existence of acute factual disagreements between Microsoft and plaintiffs. The court acknowledged that the parties were "sharply divided" and held "divergent opinions" on the likely results of its remedies decree. Final Judgment, at 62. The reason the court declined to conduct an evidentiary hearing was not because of the absence of disputed facts, but because it believed that those disputes could be resolved only through "actual experience," not further proceedings. Id.

But a prediction about future events is not, as a prediction, any less a factual issue. Indeed, the Supreme Court has acknowledged that drafting an antitrust decree by necessity "involves predictions and assumptions concerning future economic and business events." Ford Motor Co. v. United States, 405 U.S. 562, 578 (1972). Trial courts are not excused from their obligation to resolve such matters through evidentiary hearings simply because they consider the bedrock procedures of our justice system to be "of little use." Final Judgment, at 62.

The presence of factual disputes thus distinguishes this case from the decisions plaintiffs cite for the proposition that Microsoft was not entitled to an evidentiary hearing. Indeed, far from assisting plaintiffs, these cases actually confirm the proposition that courts must hold evidentiary hearings when they are confronted with disputed facts. In Ford Motor Co., the Supreme Court affirmed a divestiture order after emphasizing that the District Court had "held nine days of hearings on the remedy." 405 U.S. at 571. In Davoll v. Webb, 194 F.3d 1116 (10th Cir. 1999), the defendant both failed to submit any offers of proof, and waived its right to an evidentiary hearing by expressly agreeing that relief should be determined based solely on written submissions. Id. at 1142-43. The defendants in American Can Co. v. Mansukhani, 814 F.2d 421 (7th Cir. 1987), were not entitled to a hearing on remedies because they failed "to explain to the district court what new proof they would present to show" that the proposed remedy was unwarranted. Id. at 425. And in Socialist Workers Party v. Illinois State Board of Elections, 566 F.2d 586 (7th Cir. 1977), aff'd, 440 U.S. 173 (1979), the Seventh Circuit held that a remedies-specific hearing was unnecessary because that case involved a pure question of legal interpretation and hence "[t]here was no factual dispute as to the ground on which the injunction was ordered." Id. at 587.

Unlike the parties in Davoll, American Can, and Socialist Workers Party, Microsoft both repeatedly asserted its right to an evidentiary hearing and submitted two offers of proof. The company's "summary response" to the proposed remedy argued that it would be "impossible" to address underlying factual issues "on a highly expedited basis," Defendant's Summary Response at 6-7, reprinted in 4 J.A. at 2587-88, and Microsoft further maintained that the court could not issue a decree unless it first permitted "substantial discovery, adequate time for preparation and a full trial on relief." Defendant's Position as to Future Proceedings at 2, reprinted in 4 J.A. at 2646. And in 53 pages of submissions, Microsoft identified the specific evidence it would introduce to challenge plaintiffs' representations.

Plaintiffs further argue—and the District Court held—that no evidentiary hearing was necessary given that Microsoft long had been on notice that structural relief was a distinct possibility. It is difficult to see why this matters. Whether Microsoft had advance notice that dissolution was in the works is immaterial to whether the District Court violated the company's procedural rights by ordering it without an evidentiary hearing. To be sure, "claimed surprise at the district court's decision to consider permanent injunctive relief does not, alone, merit reversal." Socialist Workers, 566 F.2d at 587. But in this case, Microsoft's professed surprise does not stand "alone." There is something more: the company's basic procedural right to have disputed facts resolved through an evidentiary hearing.

In sum, the District Court erred when it resolved the parties' remedies-phase factual disputes by consulting only the evidence introduced during trial and plaintiffs' remedies-phase submissions, without considering the evidence Microsoft sought to introduce. We therefore vacate the District Court's final judgment, and remand with instructions to conduct a remedies-specific evidentiary hearing.

D. Failure to Provide an Adequate Explanation

We vacate the District Court's remedies decree for the additional reason that the court has failed to provide an adequate explanation for the relief it ordered. The Supreme Court has explained that a remedies decree in an antitrust case must seek to "unfetter a market from anticompetitive conduct," Ford Motor Co., 405 U.S. at 577, to "terminate the illegal monopoly, deny to the defendant the fruits of its statutory violation, and ensure that there remain no practices likely to result in monopolization in the future," United States v. United Shoe Mach. Corp., 391 U.S. 244, 250 (1968); see also United States v. Grinnell Corp., 384 U.S. 563, 577 (1966).

The District Court has not explained how its remedies decree would accomplish those objectives. Indeed, the court devoted a mere four paragraphs of its order to explaining its reasons for the remedy. They are: (1) Microsoft "does not yet concede that any of its business practices violated the Sherman Act"; (2) Microsoft "continues to do business as it has in the past"; (3) Microsoft "has proved untrustworthy in the past"; and (4) the Government, whose officials "are by reason of office obliged and expected to consider—and to act in—the public interest," won the case, "and for that reason alone have some entitlement to a remedy of their choice." Final Judgment, at 62-63. Nowhere did the District Court discuss the objectives the Supreme Court deems relevant.

E. Modification of Liability

Quite apart from its procedural difficulties, we vacate the District Court's final judgment in its entirety for the additional, independent reason that we have modified the underlying bases of liability. Of the three antitrust violations originally identified by the District Court, one is no longer viable: attempted monopolization of the browser market in violation of Sherman Act § 2. One will be remanded for liability proceedings under a different legal standard: unlawful tying in violation of § 1. Only liability for the § 2 monopoly-maintenance violation has been affirmed—and even that we have revised. Ordinarily, of course, we review the grant or denial of equitable relief under the abuse of discretion standard. See, e.g., Doran v. Salem Inn, Inc., 422 U.S. 922, 931-32 (1975) ("[T]he standard of appellate review is simply whether the issuance of the injunction, in the light of the applicable standard, constituted an abuse of discretion."). For obvious reasons, the application of that standard is not sufficient to sustain the remedy in the case before us. We cannot determine whether the District Court has abused its discretion in remedying a wrong where the court did not exercise that discretion in order to remedy the properly determined wrong. That is, the District Court determined that the conduct restrictions and the pervasive structural remedy were together appropriate to remedy the three antitrust violations set forth above. The court did not exercise its discretion to determine whether all, or for that matter, any, of those equitable remedies were required to rectify a § 2 monopoly maintenance violation taken alone. We therefore cannot sustain an exercise of discretion not yet made.

By way of comparison, in Spectrum Sports, Inc. v. McQuillan, 506 U.S. 447 (1993), the Supreme Court reviewed a damages award in a Sherman Act case. In that case, the trial court entered judgment upon a jury verdict which did not differentiate among multiple possible theories of liability under § 2. The Supreme Court ultimately determined that the trial record could not legally support a finding that the defendant had committed an illegal attempt to monopolize, and that "the trial instructions allowed the jury to infer specific intent and dangerous probability of success from the defendants' predatory conduct, without any proof of the relevant market or of a realistic probability that the defendants could achieve monopoly power in that market." Id. at 459. Therefore, the High Court reversed the Ninth Circuit's judgment affirming the District Court and remanded for further proceedings, expressly because "the jury's verdict did not negate the possibility that the § 2 verdict rested on the attempt to monopolize grounds alone...." Id. Similarly, here, we cannot presume that a District Court would exercise its discretion to fashion the same remedy where the erroneous grounds of liability were stripped from its consideration.

The Eighth Circuit confronted a similar problem in Concord Boat Corp. v. Brunswick Corp., 207 F.3d 1039 (8th Cir.), cert. denied, 121 S. Ct. 428 (2000). In that case, a group of boat builders brought an action against an engine manufacturer alleging violations of Sherman Act §§ 1 and 2, and Clayton Act § 7. After a 10-week trial, the jury found Brunswick liable on all three counts and returned a verdict for over $44 million. On appeal, the Eighth Circuit reversed the Clayton Act claim. Id. at 1053. That court held that, as a consequence, it was required to vacate the jury's remedy in its entirety. Because the "verdict form did not require the jury to consider what damages resulted from each type of violation," the court could not "know what damages it found to have been caused by the acquisitions upon which the Section 7 claims were based." Id. at 1054. The court rejected the proposition that "the entire damage award may be upheld based on Brunswick's Sherman Act liability alone," id. at 1053, holding that, because "there is no way to know what damages the jury assigned to the Section 7 claims," the defendant "would be entitled at the very least to a new damages trial on the boat builders' Sherman Act claims," id. at 1054.

Spectrum Sports and Concord Boat are distinguishable from the case before us in that both involved the award of money damages rather than equitable relief. Nonetheless, their reasoning is instructive. A court in both contexts must base its relief on some clear "indication of a significant causal connection between the conduct enjoined or mandated and the violation found directed toward the remedial goal intended." 3 PHILLIP E. AREEDA & HERBERT HOVENKAMP, ANTITRUST LAW ¶ 653(b), at 91-92 (1996). In a case such as the one before us where sweeping equitable relief is employed to remedy multiple violations, and some—indeed most—of the findings of remediable violations do not withstand appellate scrutiny, it is necessary to vacate the remedy decree since the implicit findings of causal connection no longer exist to warrant our deferential affirmance.

In short, we must vacate the remedies decree in its entirety and remand the case for a new determination. This court has drastically altered the District Court's conclusions on liability. On remand, the District Court, after affording the parties a proper opportunity to be heard, can fashion an appropriate remedy for Microsoft's antitrust violations. In particular, the court should consider which of the decree's conduct restrictions remain viable in light of our modification of the original liability decision. While the task of drafting the remedies decree is for the District Court in the first instance, because of the unusually convoluted nature of the proceedings thus far, and a desire to advance the ultimate resolution of this important controversy, we offer some further guidance for the exercise of that discretion.

F. On Remand

As a general matter, a district court is afforded broad discretion to enter that relief it calculates will best remedy the conduct it has found to be unlawful. See, e.g., Woerner v. United States Small Bus. Admin., 934 F.2d 1277, 1279 (D.C. Cir. 1991) (recognizing that an appellate court reviews a trial court's decision whether or not to grant equitable relief only for an abuse of discretion). This is no less true in antitrust cases. See, e.g., Ford Motor Co., 405 U.S. at 573 ("The District Court is clothed with 'large discretion' to fit the decree to the special needs of the individual case."); Md. & Va. Milk Producers Ass'n, Inc. v. United States, 362 U.S. 458, 473 (1960) ("The formulation of decrees is largely left to the discretion of the trial court...."). And divestiture is a common form of relief in successful antitrust prosecutions: it is indeed "the most important of antitrust remedies." See, e.g., United States v. E.I. du Pont de Nemours & Co., 366 U.S. 316, 331 (1961).

On remand, the District Court must reconsider whether the use of the structural remedy of divestiture is appropriate with respect to Microsoft, which argues that it is a unitary company. By and large, cases upon which plaintiffs rely in arguing for the split of Microsoft have involved the dissolution of entities formed by mergers and acquisitions. On the contrary, the Supreme Court has clarified that divestiture "has traditionally been the remedy for Sherman Act violations whose heart is intercorporate combination and control," du Pont, 366 U.S. at 329 (emphasis added), and that "[c]omplete divestiture is particularly appropriate where asset or stock acquisitions violate the antitrust laws," Ford Motor Co., 405 U.S. at 573 (emphasis added).

One apparent reason why courts have not ordered the dissolution of unitary companies is logistical difficulty. As the court explained in United States v. ALCOA, 91 F. Supp.

333, 416 (S.D.N.Y. 1950), a "corporation, designed to operate effectively as a single entity, cannot readily be dismembered of parts of its various operations without a marked loss of efficiency." A corporation that has expanded by acquiring its competitors often has preexisting internal lines of division along which it may more easily be split than a corporation that has expanded from natural growth. Although time and corporate modifications and developments may eventually fade those lines, at least the identifiable entities preexisted to create a template for such division as the court might later decree. With reference to those corporations that are not acquired by merger and acquisition, Judge Wyzanski accurately opined in United Shoe:

> United conducts all machine manufacture at one plant in Beverly, with one set of jigs and tools, one foundry, one laboratory for machinery problems, one managerial staff, and one labor force. It takes no Solomon to see that this organism cannot be cut into three equal and viable parts.

United States v. United Shoe Machine Co., 110 F. Supp. 295, 348 (D. Mass. 1953).

Depending upon the evidence, the District Court may find in a remedies proceeding that it would be no easier to split Microsoft in two than United Shoe in three. Microsoft's Offer of Proof in response to the court's denial of an evidentiary hearing included proffered testimony from its President and CEO Steve Ballmer that the company "is, and always has been, a unified company without free-standing business units. Microsoft is not the result of mergers or acquisitions." Microsoft further offered evidence that it is "not organized along product lines," but rather is housed in a single corporate headquarters and that it has > only one sales and marketing organization which is responsible for selling all of the company's products, one basic research organization, one product support organization, one operations department, one information technology department, one facilities department, one purchasing department, one human resources department, > one finance department, one legal department and one public relations department.

Defendant's Offer of Proof at 23-26, reprinted in 4 J.A. at 2764-67. If indeed Microsoft is a unitary company, division might very well require Microsoft to reproduce each of these departments in each new entity rather than simply allocate the differing departments among them.

In devising an appropriate remedy, the District Court also should consider whether plaintiffs have established a sufficient causal connection between Microsoft's anticompetitive conduct and its dominant position in the OS market. "Mere existence of an exclusionary act does not itself justify full feasible relief against the monopolist to create maximum competition." 3 AREEDA & HOVENKAMP, ANTITRUST LAW ¶ 650a, at 67. Rather, structural relief, which is "designed to eliminate the monopoly altogether ... require[s] a clearer indication of a significant causal connection between the conduct and creation or maintenance of the market power." Id. ¶ 653b, at 91-92 (emphasis added). Absent such causation, the antitrust defendant's unlawful behavior should be remedied by "an injunction against continuation of that conduct." Id. ¶ 650a, at 67.

As noted above, see supra Section II.C, we have found a causal connection between Microsoft's exclusionary conduct and its continuing position in the operating systems market only through inference. See 3 AREEDA & HOVENKAMP, ANTITRUST LAW ¶ 653(b), at 91-92 (suggesting that "more extensive equitable relief, particularly remedies such as divestiture designed to eliminate the monopoly altogether, ... require a clearer indication of significant causal connection between the conduct and creation or maintenance of the market power"). Indeed, the District Court expressly did not adopt the position that Microsoft would have lost its position in the OS market but for its anticompetitive behavior. Findings of Fact ¶ 411 ("There is insufficient evidence to find that, absent Microsoft's actions, Navigator and Java already would have ignited genuine competition in the market for Intel-compatible PC operating systems."). If the court on remand is unconvinced of the causal connection between Microsoft's exclusionary conduct and the company's position in the OS market, it may well conclude that divestiture is not an appropriate remedy.

While we do not undertake to dictate to the District Court the precise form that relief should take on remand, we note again that it should be tailored to fit the wrong creating the occasion for the remedy.

G. Conclusion

In sum, we vacate the District Court's remedies decree for three reasons. First, the District Court failed to hold an evidentiary hearing despite the presence of remedies-specific factual disputes. Second, the court did not provide adequate reasons for its decreed remedies. Finally, we have drastically altered the scope of Microsoft's liability, and it is for the District Court in the first instance to determine the propriety of a specific remedy for the limited ground of liability which we have upheld.

VI. Judicial Misconduct

Canon 3A(6) of the Code of Conduct for United States Judges requires federal judges to "avoid public comment on the merits of [ ] pending or impending" cases. Canon 2 tells judges to "avoid impropriety and the appearance of impropriety in all activities," on the bench and off. Canon 3A(4) forbids judges to initiate or consider ex parte communications on the merits of pending or impending proceedings. Section 455(a) of the Judicial Code requires judges to recuse themselves when their "impartiality might reasonably be questioned." 28 U.S.C. § 455(a).

All indications are that the District Judge violated each of these ethical precepts by talking about the case with reporters. The violations were deliberate, repeated, egregious, and flagrant. The only serious question is what consequences should follow. Microsoft urges us to disqualify the District Judge, vacate the judgment in its entirety and toss out the findings of fact, and remand for a new trial before a different District Judge. At the other extreme, plaintiffs ask us to do nothing. We agree with neither position.

A. The District Judge's Communications with the Press

Immediately after the District Judge entered final judgment on June 7, 2000, accounts of interviews with him began appearing in the press. Some of the interviews were held after he entered final judgment. See Peter Spiegel, Microsoft Judge Defends Post-trial Comments, FIN. TIMES (London), Oct. 7, 2000, at 4; John R. Wilke, For Antitrust Judge, Trust, or Lack of It, Really Was the Issue—In an Interview, Jackson Says Microsoft Did the Damage to Its Credibility in Court, WALL ST. J., June 8, 2000, at A1. The District Judge also aired his views about the case to larger audiences, giving speeches at a college and at an antitrust seminar. See James V. Grimaldi, Microsoft Judge Says Ruling at Risk; Every Trial Decision Called 'Vulnerable', WASH. POST, Sept. 29, 2000, at E1; Alison Schmauch, Microsoft Judge Shares Experiences, THE DARTMOUTH ONLINE, Oct. 3, 2000.

From the published accounts, it is apparent that the Judge also had been giving secret interviews to select reporters before entering final judgment—in some instances long before. The earliest interviews we know of began in September 1999, shortly after the parties finished presenting evidence but two months before the court issued its Findings of Fact. See Joel Brinkley & Steve Lohr, U.S. vs. Microsoft: Pursuing a Giant; Retracing the Missteps in the Microsoft Defense, N.Y. TIMES, June 9, 2000, at A1. Interviews with reporters from the New York Times and Ken Auletta, another reporter who later wrote a book on the Microsoft case, continued throughout late 1999 and the first half of 2000, during which time the Judge issued his Findings of Fact, Conclusions of Law, and Final Judgment. See id.; Ken Auletta, Final Offer, THE NEW YORKER, Jan. 15, 2001, at 40. The Judge "embargoed" these interviews; that is, he insisted that the fact and content of the interviews remain secret until he issued the Final Judgment.

Before we recount the statements attributed to the District Judge, we need to say a few words about the state of the record. All we have are the published accounts and what the reporters say the Judge said. Those accounts were not admitted in evidence. They may be hearsay. See FED. R. EVID. 801(c); Metro. Council of NAACP Branches v. FCC, 46 F.3d 1154, 1165 (D.C. Cir. 1995) ("We seriously question whether a New York Times article is admissible evidence of the truthfulness of its contents.").

We are of course concerned about granting a request to disqualify a federal judge when the material supporting it has not been admitted in evidence. Disqualification is never taken lightly. In the wrong hands, a disqualification motion is a procedural weapon to harass opponents and delay proceedings. If supported only by rumor, speculation, or innuendo, it is also a means to tarnish the reputation of a federal judge.

But the circumstances of this case are most unusual. By placing an embargo on the interviews, the District Judge ensured that the full extent of his actions would not be revealed until this case was on appeal. Plaintiffs, in defending the judgment, do not dispute the statements attributed to him in the press; they do not request an evidentiary hearing; and they do not argue that Microsoft should have filed a motion in the District Court before raising the matter on appeal. At oral argument, plaintiffs all but conceded that the Judge violated ethical restrictions by discussing the case in public: "On behalf of the governments, I have no brief to defend the District Judge's decision to discuss this case publicly while it was pending on appeal, and I have no brief to defend the judge's decision to discuss the case with reporters while the trial was proceeding, even given the embargo on any reporting concerning those conversations until after the trial." 02/27/01 Ct. Appeals Tr. at 326.

We must consider too that the federal disqualification provisions reflect a strong federal policy to preserve the actual and apparent impartiality of the federal judiciary. Judicial misconduct may implicate that policy regardless of the means by which it is disclosed to the public. Cf. The Washington Post v. Robinson, 935 F.2d 282, 291 (D.C. Cir.

1991) (taking judicial notice of newspaper articles to ascertain whether a fact was within public knowledge). Also, in our analysis of the arguments presented by the parties, the specifics of particular conversations are less important than their cumulative effect.

For these reasons we have decided to adjudicate Microsoft's disqualification request notwithstanding the state of the record. The same reasons also warrant a departure from our usual practice of declining to address issues raised for the first time on appeal: the "matter of what questions may be taken up and resolved for the first time on appeal is one left primarily to the discretion of the courts of appeals, to be exercised on the facts of individual cases." Singleton v. Wulff, 428 U.S. 106, 121 (1976); accord Hormel v. Helvering, 312 U.S. 552, 556-57 (1941); Nat'l Ass'n of Mfrs. v. Dep't of Labor, 159 F.3d 597, 605-06 (D.C. Cir. 1998). We will assume the truth of the press accounts and not send the case back for an evidentiary hearing on this subject. We reach no judgment on whether the details of the interviews were accurately recounted.

The published accounts indicate that the District Judge discussed numerous topics relating to the case. Among them was his distaste for the defense of technological integration—one of the central issues in the lawsuit. In September 1999, two months before his Findings of Fact and six months before his Conclusions of Law, and in remarks that were kept secret until after the Final Judgment, the Judge told reporters from the New York Times that he questioned Microsoft's integration of a web browser into Windows. Stating that he was "not a fan of integration," he drew an analogy to a 35-millimeter camera with an integrated light meter that in his view should also be offered separately: "You like the convenience of having a light meter built in, integrated, so all you have to do is press a button to get a reading. But do you think camera makers should also serve photographers who want to use a separate light meter, so they can hold it up, move it around?" JOEL BRINKLEY & STEVE LOHR, U.S. v. MICROSOFT 263 (2001). In other remarks, the Judge commented on the integration at the heart of the case: "[I]t was quite clear to me that the motive of Microsoft in bundling the Internet browser was not one of consumer convenience. The evidence that this was done for the consumer was not credible.... The evidence was so compelling that there was an ulterior motive." Wilke, WALL ST. J. As for tying law in general, he criticized this court's ruling in the consent decree case, saying it "was wrongheaded on several counts" and would exempt the software industry from the antitrust laws. BRINKLEY & LOHR, U.S. v. MICROSOFT 78, 295; Brinkley & Lohr, N.Y. TIMES.

Reports of the interviews have the District Judge describing Microsoft's conduct, with particular emphasis on what he regarded as the company's prevarication, hubris, and impenitence. In some of his secret meetings with reporters, the Judge offered his contemporaneous impressions of testimony. He permitted at least one reporter to see an entry concerning Bill Gates in his "oversized green notebook." KEN AULETTA, WORLD WAR 3.0, at 112 (2001). He also provided numerous after-the-fact credibility assessments. He told reporters that Bill Gates' "testimony is inherently without credibility" and "[i]f you can't believe this guy, who else can you believe?" BRINKLEY & LOHR, U.S. v. MICROSOFT 278; Brinkley & Lohr, N.Y. TIMES; see also Auletta, THE NEW YORKER, at 40. As for the company's other witnesses, the Judge is reported as saying that there "were times when I became impatient with Microsoft witnesses who were giving speeches." "[T]hey were telling me things I just flatly could not credit." Brinkley & Lohr, N.Y. TIMES. In an interview given the day he entered the break-up order, he summed things up: "Falsus in uno, falsus in omnibus": "Untrue in one thing, untrue in everything." "I don't subscribe to that as absolutely true. But it does lead one to suspicion. It's a universal human experience. If someone lies to you once, how much else can you credit as the truth?" Wilke, WALL ST. J.

According to reporter Auletta, the District Judge told him in private that, "I thought they [Microsoft and its executives] didn't think they were regarded as adult members of the community. I thought they would learn." AULETTA, WORLD WAR 3.0, at 14. The Judge told a college audience that "Bill Gates is an ingenious engineer, but I don't think he is that adept at business ethics. He has not yet come to realise things he did (when Microsoft was smaller) he should not have done when he became a monopoly." Spiegel, FIN. TIMES. Characterizing Gates' and his company's "crime" as hubris, the Judge stated that "[i]f I were able to propose a remedy of my devising, I'd require Mr. Gates to write a book report" on Napoleon Bonaparte, "[b]ecause I think [Gates] has a Napoleonic concept of himself and his company, an arrogance that derives from power and unalloyed success, with no leavening hard experience, no reverses." Auletta, THE NEW YORKER, at 41; see also AULETTA, WORLD WAR 3.0, at 397. The Judge apparently became, in Auletta's words, "increasingly troubled by what he learned about Bill Gates and couldn't get out of his mind the group picture he had seen of Bill Gates and Paul Allen and their shaggy-haired first employees at Microsoft." The reporter wrote that the Judge said he saw in the picture "a smart-mouthed young kid who has extraordinary ability and needs a little discipline. I've often said to colleagues that Gates would be better off if he had finished Harvard." AULETTA, WORLD WAR 3.0, at 168-69; see also Auletta, THE NEW YORKER, at 46 (reporting the District Judge's statement that "they [Microsoft and its executives] don't act like grown-ups!" "[T]o this day they continue to deny they did anything wrong.").

The District Judge likened Microsoft's writing of incriminating documents to drug traffickers who "never figure out that they shouldn't be saying certain things on the phone." BRINKLEY & LOHR, U.S. v. MICROSOFT 6; Brinkley & Lohr, N.Y. TIMES. He invoked the drug trafficker analogy again to denounce Microsoft's protestations of innocence, this time with a reference to the notorious Newton Street Crew that terrorized parts of Washington, D.C. Reporter Auletta wrote in The New Yorker that the Judge > went as far as to compare the company's declaration of innocence to the protestations of gangland killers. He was referring to five gang members in a racketeering, drug-dealing, and murder trial that he had presided over > four years earlier. In that case, the three victims had had their heads bound with duct tape before they were riddled with bullets from semi-automatic weapons. "On the day of the sentencing, the gang members maintained that they had done nothing wrong, saying that the whole case was a conspiracy by the white power structure to destroy them," Jackson recalled. "I am now under no illusions that miscreants will realize that other parts of society will view them that way."

Auletta, THE NEW YORKER, at 40-41; AULETTA, WORLD WAR 3.0, at 369-70 (same); see also Auletta, THE NEW YORKER, at 46.

The District Judge also secretly divulged to reporters his views on the remedy for Microsoft's antitrust violations. On the question whether Microsoft was entitled to any process at the remedy stage, the Judge told reporters in May 2000 that he was "not aware of any case authority that says I have to give them any due process at all. The case is over. They lost." Brinkley & Lohr, N.Y. TIMES. Another reporter has the Judge asking "[w]ere the Japanese allowed to propose terms of their surrender?" Spiegel, FIN. TIMES. The District Judge also told reporters the month before he issued his break-up order that "[a]ssuming, as I think they are, [ ] the Justice Department and the states are genuinely concerned about the public interest," "I know they have carefully studied all the possible options. This isn't a bunch of amateurs. They have consulted with some of the best minds in America over a long period of time." "I am not in a position to duplicate that and re-engineer their work. There's no way I can equip myself to do a better job than they have done." Brinkley & Lohr, N.Y. TIMES; cf. Final Judgment, at 62-63.

In February 2000, four months before his final order splitting the company in two, the District Judge reportedly told New York Times reporters that he was "not at all comfortable with restructuring the company," because he was unsure whether he was "competent to do that." Brinkley & Lohr, N.Y. TIMES; see also BRINKLEY & LOHR, U.S. v. MICROSOFT 277-78 (same); cf. AULETTA, WORLD WAR 3.0, at 370 (comment by the Judge in April 2000 that he was inclining toward behavioral rather than structural remedies). A few months later, he had a change of heart. He told the same reporters that "with what looks like Microsoft intransigence, a breakup is inevitable." Brinkley & Lohr, N.Y. TIMES; see also BRINKLEY & LOHR, U.S. v. MICROSOFT 315. The Judge recited a "North Carolina mule trainer" story to explain his change in thinking from "[i]f it ain't broken, don't try to fix it" and "I just don't think that [restructuring the company] is something I want to try to do on my own" to ordering Microsoft broken in two:

> He had a trained mule who could do all kinds of wonderful tricks. One day somebody asked him: "How do you do it? How do you train the mule to do all these amazing things?" "Well," he answered, "I'll show you." He took a 2-by-4 and whopped him upside the head. The mule was reeling and fell to his knees, and the trainer said: "You just have to get his attention."

BRINKLEY & LOHR, U.S. v. MICROSOFT 278. The Judge added: "I hope I've got Microsoft's attention." Id.; see also Grimaldi, WASH. POST (comments by the Judge blaming the break-up on Microsoft's intransigence and on what he perceived to be Microsoft's responsibility for the failure of settlement talks); Spiegel, FIN. TIMES (the Judge blaming break-up on Microsoft's intransigence).

B. Violations of the Code of Conduct for United States Judges

The Code of Conduct for United States Judges was adopted by the Judicial Conference of the United States in 1973. It prescribes ethical norms for federal judges as a means to preserve the actual and apparent integrity of the federal judiciary. Every federal judge receives a copy of the Code, the Commentary to the Code, the Advisory Opinions of the Judicial Conference's Committee on Codes of Conduct, and digests of the Committee's informal, unpublished opinions. See II GUIDE TO JUDICIARY POLICIES AND PROCEDURES (1973). The material is periodically updated. Judges who have questions about whether their conduct would be consistent with the Code may write to the Codes of Conduct Committee for a written, confidential opinion. See Introduction, CODE OF CONDUCT. The Committee traditionally responds promptly. A judge may also seek informal advice from the Committee's circuit representative.

While some of the Code's Canons frequently generate questions about their application, others are straightforward and easily understood. Canon 3A(6) is an example of the latter. In forbidding federal judges to comment publicly "on the merits of a pending or impending action," Canon 3A(6) applies to cases pending before any court, state or federal, trial or appellate. See JEFFREY M. SHAMAN ET AL., JUDICIAL CONDUCT AND ETHICS § 10.34, at 353 (3d ed. 2000). As "impending" indicates, the prohibition begins even before a case enters the court system, when there is reason to believe a case may be filed. Cf. E. WAYNE THODE, REPORTER'S NOTES TO CODE OF JUDICIAL CONDUCT 54 (1973). An action remains "pending" until "completion of the appellate process." CODE OF CONDUCT Canon 3A(6) cmt.; Comm. on Codes of Conduct, Adv. Op. No. 55 (1998).

The Microsoft case was "pending" during every one of the District Judge's meetings with reporters; the case is "pending" now; and even after our decision issues, it will remain pending for some time. The District Judge breached his ethical duty under Canon 3A(6) each time he spoke to a reporter about the merits of the case. Although the reporters interviewed him in private, his comments were public. Court was not in session and his discussion of the case took place outside the presence of the parties. He provided his views not to court personnel assisting him in the case, but to members of the public. And these were not just any members of the public. Because he was talking to reporters, the Judge knew his comments would eventually receive widespread dissemination.

It is clear that the District Judge was not discussing purely procedural matters, which are a permissible subject of public comment under one of the Canon's three narrowly drawn exceptions. He disclosed his views on the factual and legal matters at the heart of the case. His opinions about the credibility of witnesses, the validity of legal theories, the culpability of the defendant, the choice of remedy, and so forth all dealt with the merits of the action. It is no excuse that the Judge may have intended to "educate" the public about the case or to rebut "public misperceptions" purportedly caused by the parties. See Grimaldi, WASH. POST; Microsoft Judge Says He May Step down from Case on Appeal, WALL ST. J., Oct. 30, 2000. If those were his intentions, he could have addressed the factual and legal issues as he saw them—and thought the public should see them—in his Findings of Fact, Conclusions of Law, Final Judgment, or in a written opinion. Or he could have held his tongue until all appeals were concluded.

Far from mitigating his conduct, the District Judge's insistence on secrecy—his embargo—made matters worse. Concealment of the interviews suggests knowledge of their impropriety. Concealment also prevented the parties from nipping his improprieties in the bud. Without any knowledge of the interviews, neither the plaintiffs nor the defendant had a chance to object or to seek the Judge's removal before he issued his Final Judgment.

Other federal judges have been disqualified for making limited public comments about cases pending before them. See In re Boston's Children First, 244 F.3d 164 (1st Cir. 2001); In re IBM Corp., 45 F.3d 641 (2d Cir. 1995); United States v. Cooley, 1 F.3d 985 (10th Cir. 1993). Given the extent of the Judge's transgressions in this case, we have little doubt that if the parties had discovered his secret liaisons with the press, he would have been disqualified, voluntarily or by court order. Cf. In re Barry, 946 F.2d 913 (D.C. Cir. 1991) (per curiam); id. at 915 (Edwards, J., dissenting).

In addition to violating the rule prohibiting public comment, the District Judge's reported conduct raises serious questions under Canon 3A(4). That Canon states that a "judge should accord to every person who is legally interested in a proceeding, or the person's lawyer, full right to be heard according to law, and, except as authorized by law, neither initiate nor consider ex parte communications on the merits, or procedures affecting the merits, of a pending or impending proceeding." CODE OF CONDUCT Canon 3A(4).

What did the reporters convey to the District Judge during their secret sessions? By one account, the Judge spent a total of ten hours giving taped interviews to one reporter. AULETTA, WORLD WAR 3.0, at 14 n.*. We do not know whether he spent even more time in untaped conversations with the same reporter, nor do we know how much time he spent with others. But we think it safe to assume that these interviews were not monologues. Interviews often become conversations. When reporters pose questions or make assertions, they may be furnishing information, information that may reflect their personal views of the case. The published accounts indicate this happened on at least one occasion. Ken Auletta reported, for example, that he told the Judge "that Microsoft employees professed shock that he thought they had violated the law and behaved unethically," at which time the Judge became "agitated" by "Microsoft's 'obstinacy'." Id. at 369. It is clear that Auletta had views of the case. As he wrote in a Washington Post editorial, "[a]nyone who sat in [the District Judge's] courtroom during the trial had seen ample evidence of Microsoft's sometimes thuggish tactics." Ken Auletta, Maligning the Microsoft Judge, WASH. POST, Mar. 7, 2001, at A23.

The District Judge's repeated violations of Canons 3A(6) and 3A(4) also violated Canon 2, which provides that "a judge should avoid impropriety and the appearance of impropriety in all activities." CODE OF CONDUCT Canon 2; see also In re Charge of Judicial Misconduct, 47 F.3d 399, 400 (10th Cir. Jud. Council 1995) ("The allegations of extra-judicial comments cause the Council substantial concern under both Canon 3A(6) and Canon 2 of the Judicial Code of Conduct."). Canon 2A requires federal judges to "respect and comply with the law" and to "act at all times in a manner that promotes public confidence in the integrity and impartiality of the judiciary." CODE OF CONDUCT Canon 2A. The Code of Conduct is the law with respect to the ethical obligations of federal judges, and it is clear the District Judge violated it on multiple occasions in this case. The rampant disregard for the judiciary's ethical obligations that the public witnessed in this case undoubtedly jeopardizes "public confidence in the integrity" of the District Court proceedings.

Another point needs to be stressed. Rulings in this case have potentially huge financial consequences for one of the nation's largest publicly-traded companies and its investors. The District Judge's secret interviews during the trial provided a select few with inside information about the case, information that enabled them and anyone they shared it with to anticipate rulings before the Judge announced them to the world. Although he "embargoed" his comments, the Judge had no way of policing the reporters. For all he knew there may have been trading on the basis of the information he secretly conveyed. The public cannot be expected to maintain confidence in the integrity and impartiality of the federal judiciary in the face of such conduct.

C. Appearance of Partiality

The Code of Conduct contains no enforcement mechanism. See THODE, REPORTER'S NOTES TO CODE OF JUDICIAL CONDUCT 43. The Canons, including the one that requires a judge to disqualify himself in certain circumstances, see CODE OF CONDUCT Canon 3C, are self-enforcing. There are, however, remedies extrinsic to the Code. One is an internal disciplinary proceeding, begun with the filing of a complaint with the clerk of the court of appeals pursuant to 28 U.S.C. § 372(c). Another is disqualification of the offending judge under either 28 U.S.C. § 144, which requires the filing of an affidavit while the case is in the District Court, or 28 U.S.C. § 455, which does not. Microsoft urges the District Judge's disqualification under § 455(a): a judge "shall disqualify himself in any proceeding in which his impartiality might reasonably be questioned." 28 U.S.C. § 455(a). The standard for disqualification under § 455(a) is an objective one. The question is whether a reasonable and informed observer would question the judge's impartiality. See In re Barry, 946 F.2d at 914;

see also In re Aguinda, 241 F.3d 194, 201 (2d Cir. 2001); RICHARD E. FLAMM, JUDICIAL DISQUALIFICATION § 24.2.1 (1996).

"The very purpose of § 455(a) is to promote confidence in the judiciary by avoiding even the appearance of impropriety whenever possible." Liljeberg v. Health Servs. Acquisition Corp., 486 U.S. 847, 865 (1988). As such, violations of the Code of Conduct may give rise to a violation of § 455(a) if doubt is cast on the integrity of the judicial process. It has been argued that any "public comment by a judge concerning the facts, applicable law, or merits of a case that is sub judice in his court or any comment concerning the parties or their attorneys would raise grave doubts about the judge's objectivity and his willingness to reserve judgment until the close of the proceeding." William G. Ross, Extrajudicial Speech: Charting the Boundaries of Propriety, 2 GEO. J. LEGAL ETHICS 589, 598 (1989). Some courts of appeals have taken a hard line on public comments, finding violations of § 455(a) for judicial commentary on pending cases that seems mild in comparison to what we are confronting in this case. See Boston's Children First, 244 F.3d 164 (granting writ of mandamus ordering district judge to recuse herself under § 455(a) because of public comments on class certification and standing in a pending case); In re IBM Corp., 45 F.3d 641 (granting writ of mandamus ordering district judge to recuse himself based in part on the appearance of partiality caused by his giving newspaper interviews); Cooley, 1 F.3d 985 (vacating convictions and disqualifying district judge for appearance of partiality because he appeared on television program Nightline and stated that abortion protestors in a case before him were breaking the law and that his injunction would be obeyed).

While § 455(a) is concerned with actual and apparent impropriety, the statute requires disqualification only when a judge's "impartiality might reasonably be questioned." 28 U.S.C. § 455(a). Although this court has condemned public judicial comments on pending cases, we have not gone so far as to hold that every violation of Canon 3A(6) or every impropriety under the Code of Conduct inevitably destroys the appearance of impartiality and thus violates § 455(a).

See In re Barry, 946 F.2d at 914; see also Boston's Children First, 244 F.3d at 168; United States v. Fortier, 242 F.3d 1224, 1229 (10th Cir. 2001).

In this case, however, we believe the line has been crossed. The public comments were not only improper, but also would lead a reasonable, informed observer to question the District Judge's impartiality. Public confidence in the integrity and impartiality of the judiciary is seriously jeopardized when judges secretly share their thoughts about the merits of pending cases with the press. Judges who covet publicity, or convey the appearance that they do, lead any objective observer to wonder whether their judgments are being influenced by the prospect of favorable coverage in the media. Discreet and limited public comments may not compromise a judge's apparent impartiality, but we have little doubt that the District Judge's conduct had that effect. Appearance may be all there is, but that is enough to invoke the Canons and § 455(a).

Judge Learned Hand spoke of "this America of ours where the passion for publicity is a disease, and where swarms of foolish, tawdry moths dash with rapture into its consuming fire...." LEARNED HAND, THE SPIRIT OF LIBERTY 132-33 (2d ed. 1953). Judges are obligated to resist this passion. Indulging it compromises what Edmund Burke justly regarded as the "cold neutrality of an impartial judge." Cold or not, federal judges must maintain the appearance of impartiality. What was true two centuries ago is true today: "Deference to the judgments and rulings of courts depends upon public confidence in the integrity and independence of judges." CODE OF CONDUCT Canon 1 cmt. Public confidence in judicial impartiality cannot survive if judges, in disregard of their ethical obligations, pander to the press.

We recognize that it would be extraordinary to disqualify a judge for bias or appearance of partiality when his remarks arguably reflected what he learned, or what he thought he learned, during the proceedings. See Liteky v. United States, 510 U.S. 540, 554-55 (1994); United States v. Barry, 961 F.2d 260, 263 (D.C. Cir. 1992). But this "extrajudicial source" rule has no bearing on the case before us. The problem here is not just what the District Judge said, but to whom he said it and when. His crude characterizations of Microsoft, his frequent denigrations of Bill Gates, his mule trainer analogy as a reason for his remedy—all of these remarks and others might not have given rise to a violation of the Canons or of § 455(a) had he uttered them from the bench. See Liteky, 510 U.S. at 555-56; CODE OF CONDUCT Canon 3A(6) (exception to prohibition on public comments for "statements made in the course of the judge's official duties"). But then Microsoft would have had an opportunity to object, perhaps even to persuade, and the Judge would have made a record for review on appeal. It is an altogether different matter when the statements are made outside the courtroom, in private meetings unknown to the parties, in anticipation that ultimately the Judge's remarks would be reported. Rather than manifesting neutrality and impartiality, the reports of the interviews with the District Judge convey the impression of a judge posturing for posterity, trying to please the reporters with colorful analogies and observations bound to wind up in the stories they write. Members of the public may reasonably question whether the District Judge's desire for press coverage influenced his judgments, indeed whether a publicity-seeking judge might consciously or subconsciously seek the publicity-maximizing outcome. We believe, therefore, that the District Judge's interviews with reporters created an appearance that he was not acting impartially, as the Code of Conduct and § 455(a) require.

D. Remedies for Judicial Misconduct and Appearance of Partiality

1. Disqualification

Disqualification is mandatory for conduct that calls a judge's impartiality into question. See 28 U.S.C. § 455(a); In re School Asbestos Litig., 977 F.2d 764, 783 (3d Cir. 1992). Section 455 does not prescribe the scope of disqualification. Rather, Congress "delegated to the judiciary the task of fashioning the remedies that will best serve the purpose" of the disqualification statute. Liljeberg, 486 U.S. at 862.

REV_00128455

At a minimum, § 455(a) requires prospective disqualification of the offending judge, that is, disqualification from the judge's hearing any further proceedings in the case. See United States v. Microsoft Corp., 56 F.3d 1448, 1463-65 (D.C. Cir. 1995) (per curiam) ("Microsoft I"). Microsoft urges retroactive disqualification of the District Judge, which would entail disqualification antedated to an earlier part of the proceedings and vacatur of all subsequent acts. Cf. In re School Asbestos Litig., 977 F.2d at 786 (discussing remedy options).

"There need not be a draconian remedy for every violation of § 455(a)." Liljeberg, 486 U.S. at 862. Liljeberg held that a district judge could be disqualified under § 455(a) after entering final judgment in a case, even though the judge was not (but should have been) aware of the grounds for disqualification before final judgment. The Court identified three factors relevant to the question whether vacatur is appropriate: "in determining whether a judgment should be vacated for a violation of § 455(a), it is appropriate to consider the risk of injustice to the parties in the particular case, the risk that the denial of relief will produce injustice in other cases, and the risk of undermining the public's confidence in the judicial process." Id. at 864. Although the Court was discussing § 455(a) in a slightly different context (the judgment there had become final after appeal and the movant sought to have it vacated under Rule 60(b)), we believe the test it propounded applies as well to cases such as this in which the full extent of the disqualifying circumstances came to light only while the appeal was pending. See In re School Asbestos Litig., 977 F.2d at 785.

Our application of Liljeberg leads us to conclude that the appropriate remedy for the violations of § 455(a) is disqualification of the District Judge retroactive only to the date he entered the order breaking up Microsoft. We therefore will vacate that order in its entirety and remand this case to a different District Judge, but will not set aside the existing Findings of Fact or Conclusions of Law (except insofar as specific findings are clearly erroneous or legal conclusions are incorrect).

This partially retroactive disqualification minimizes the risk of injustice to the parties and the damage to public confidence in the judicial process. Although the violations of the Code of Conduct and § 455(a) were serious, full retroactive disqualification is unnecessary. It would unduly penalize plaintiffs, who were innocent and unaware of the misconduct, and would have only slight marginal deterrent effect.

Most important, full retroactive disqualification is unnecessary to protect Microsoft's right to an impartial adjudication. The District Judge's conduct destroyed the appearance of impartiality. Microsoft neither alleged nor demonstrated that it rose to the level of actual bias or prejudice. There is no reason to presume that everything the District Judge did is suspect. See In re Allied-Signal Inc., 891 F.2d 974, 975-76 (1st Cir. 1989); cf. Liberty Lobby, Inc. v. Dow Jones & Co., 838 F.2d 1287, 1301-02 (D.C. Cir. 1988). Although Microsoft challenged very few of the findings as clearly erroneous, we have carefully reviewed the entire record and discern no basis to suppose that actual bias infected his factual findings.

The most serious judicial misconduct occurred near or during the remedial stage. It is therefore commensurate that our remedy focus on that stage of the case. The District Judge's impatience with what he viewed as intransigence on the part of the company; his refusal to allow an evidentiary hearing; his analogizing Microsoft to Japan at the end of World War II; his story about the mule—all of these out-of-court remarks and others, plus the Judge's evident efforts to please the press, would give a reasonable, informed observer cause to question his impartiality in ordering the company split in two.

To repeat, we disqualify the District Judge retroactive only to the imposition of the remedy, and thus vacate the remedy order for the reasons given in Section V and because of the appearance of partiality created by the District Judge's misconduct.

2. Review of Findings of Fact and Conclusions of Law

Given the limited scope of our disqualification of the District Judge, we have let stand for review his Findings of Fact and Conclusions of Law. The severity of the District Judge's misconduct and the appearance of partiality it created have led us to consider whether we can and should subject his factfindings to greater scrutiny. For a number of reasons we have rejected any such approach.

The Federal Rules require that district court findings of fact not be set aside unless they are clearly erroneous. See FED. R. CIV. P. 52(a). Ordinarily, there is no basis for doubting that the District Court's factual findings are entitled to the substantial deference the clearly erroneous standard entails. But of course this is no ordinary case. Deference to a district court's factfindings presumes impartiality on the lower court's part. When impartiality is called into question, how much deference is due?

The question implies that there is some middle ground, but we believe there is none. As the rules are written, district court factfindings receive either full deference under the clearly erroneous standard or they must be vacated. There is no de novo appellate review of factfindings and no intermediate level between de novo and clear error, not even for findings the court of appeals may consider sub-par. See Amadeo v. Zant, 486 U.S. 214, 228 (1988) ("The District Court's lack of precision, however, is no excuse for the Court of Appeals to ignore the dictates of Rule 52(a) and engage in impermissible appellate factfinding."); Anderson v. City of Bessemer City, 470 U.S. 564, 571-75 (1985) (criticizing district court practice of adopting a party's proposed factfindings but overturning court of appeals' application of "close scrutiny" to such findings).

Rule 52(a) mandates clearly erroneous review of all district court factfindings: "Findings of fact, whether based on oral or documentary evidence, shall not be set aside unless clearly erroneous, and due regard shall be given to the opportunity of the trial court to judge of the credibility of the witnesses." FED. R. CIV. P. 52(a). The rule "does not make exceptions or purport to exclude certain categories of factual findings from the obligation of a court of appeals to accept a district court's findings unless clearly erroneous." Pullman-Standard v. Swint, 456 U.S. 273, 287 (1982); see also Anderson, 470 U.S. at 574-75; Inwood Labs., Inc. v. Ives Labs., Inc., 456 U.S. 844, 855-58 (1982). The Supreme Court has emphasized on multiple occasions that "[i]n applying the clearly erroneous standard to the findings of a district court sitting without a jury, appellate courts must constantly have in mind that their function is not to decide factual issues de novo." Zenith Radio Corp. v. Hazeltine Research, Inc., 395 U.S. 100, 123 (1969); Anderson, 470 U.S. at 573 (quoting Zenith).

The mandatory nature of Rule 52(a) does not compel us to accept factfindings that result from the District Court's misapplication of governing law or that otherwise do not permit meaningful appellate review. See Pullman-Standard, 456 U.S. at 292; Inwood Labs., 456 U.S. at 855 n.15. Nor must we accept findings that are utterly deficient in other ways. In such a case, we vacate and remand for further factfinding. See 9 MOORE'S FEDERAL PRACTICE § 52.12[1] (Matthew Bender 3d ed. 2000); 9A CHARLES A. WRIGHT & ARTHUR R. MILLER, FEDERAL PRACTICE AND PROCEDURE § 2577, at 514-22 (2d ed. 1995); cf. Icicle Seafoods, Inc. v. Worthington, 475 U.S. 709, 714 (1986); Pullman-Standard, 456 U.S. at 291-92.

When there is fair room for argument that the District Court's factfindings should be vacated in toto, the court of appeals should be especially careful in determining that the findings are worthy of the deference Rule 52(a) prescribes. See, e.g., Thermo Electron Corp. v. Schiavone Constr. Co., 915 F.2d 770, 773 (1st Cir. 1990); cf. Bose Corp. v. Consumers Union of United States, Inc., 466 U.S. 485, 499 (1984). Thus, although Microsoft alleged only appearance of bias, not actual bias, we have reviewed the record with painstaking care and have discerned no evidence of actual bias. See S. Pac. Communications Co. v. AT & T, 740 F.2d 980, 984 (D.C. Cir. 1984); Cooley, 1 F.3d at 996 (disqualifying district judge for appearance of partiality but noting that "the record of the proceedings below ... discloses no bias").

In light of this conclusion, the District Judge's factual findings both warrant deference under the clear error standard of review and, though exceedingly sparing in citations to the record, permit meaningful appellate review. In reaching these conclusions, we have not ignored the District Judge's reported intention to craft his factfindings and Conclusions of Law to minimize the breadth of our review. The Judge reportedly told Ken Auletta that "[w]hat I want to do is confront the Court of Appeals with an established factual record which is a fait accompli." AULETTA, WORLD WAR 3.0, at 230. He explained: "part of the inspiration for doing that is that I take mild offense at their reversal of my preliminary injunction in the consent-decree case, where they went ahead and made up about ninety percent of the facts on their own." Id. Whether the District Judge takes offense, mild or severe, is beside the point. Appellate decisions command compliance, not agreement. We do not view the District Judge's remarks as anything other than his expression of disagreement with this court's decision, and his desire to provide extensive factual findings in this case, which he did.

VII. CONCLUSION

The judgment of the District Court is affirmed in part, reversed in part, and remanded in part. We vacate in full the Final Judgment embodying the remedial order, and remand the case to the District Court for reassignment to a different trial judge for further proceedings consistent with this opinion.

Hypothetical Sitaution--, Larry Lindsey agrees to particpate in a business related conference. The sponsor does not pay for tickets, lodgings and there is a conference fee. According to White House Travel office (and stop me if I am mistaken) government rated/issued tickets cannot be upgraded from coach. If Mr. Lindsey would like to travel first class can he purchase the tickets using his own frequent flyer miles?

Will the government still pay for the Conference Fee and lodging? Or does LL paying for the tickets on his own with miles take away from this trip being business?

PLEASE let me know!

Can we get the same information expressed as a percentage? I.e., 50% of the Clinton nominees received a hearing in 30 days. Absolute numbers don't really tell you as much.

I'll check to find out whether the documentation I have includes every single Clinton judicial nominee -- if so, I'll calculate a percentage.

Can we get the same information expressed as a percentage? I.e., 50% of the Clinton nominees received a hearing in 30 days. Absolute numbers don't really tell you as much.

Based on some information from Senate Judiciary, it appears that the following number of judicial candidates received hearings within the following time frames (each entry is cumulative). I looked only at the period Jan. 1995 to Jan. 2001, the period during which there was a Republican Senate and a Democratic President.

This memo tried to outline the broad parameters while also giving discretion on a case by case basis to adjust where necessary. This is all policy, not law, so the food question can be done as we see fit. But if you are official for traveling, it makes sense that your food while on travel is covered one way or another. That is the standard government rule.

Subject: Re: OFL staff travel

That's good to hear. All the old memos that I have from Clinton and Bush (41) don't seem to list the FL's COS, only her personal aide. And, in the case of one 1994 memo, the policy was apparently that all staff members "accompanuing the First Lady to assist in carrying out official functions travel on a non-reimburseable basis."

Did you prepare a memo on this? The only memo I have from you (dated March 22, 2001) doesn't really address employees travelling with the FL on personal travel; it mentions only "guests" who must reimburse. If another memo exists, can I get a copy for my file? Also, do I assume that, if an employee is non-reimburseable, it necessarily follows that his/her food is paid for from federal travel funds? Or should those be separate inquiries -- i.e. just because you don't have to reimburse for your flight does not mean that the gov't pays your expenses or pays you a per diem.

Sorry for having so many questions, but I'd like to get this stuff clear in my own mind.

I think you are the expert on this one, although I'd be interested in hearing your response. Do I recall correctly that only the First Lady's personal aide is "always official"? Does that mean that if Andi Ball goes, she needs to reimbuse for her air travel?

what about travel with Mrs. Bush on her plane (not Air Force One) on official business. And what about travel when it is not necessarily official business, but she is travelling to the ranch or elsewhere.

MEMORANDUM FOR VICKERS MEADOWS

FROM: BRETT M. KAVANAUGH

SUBJECT: Official Travelers

As we have discussed, certain government officers and employees are always considered to be traveling on official business when traveling with the President. They include the Chief of Staff, the National Security Advisor, the Personal Aide to the President, the President's secretary, the doctor, the photographer, White House Military Office officials, and Secret Service and military personnel.

On a case by case basis, certain other officials may also be considered official travelers, such as the Press Secretary.

As to travel to political events, otherwise official travelers who engage in political activity during the trip (the Chief of Staff, for example) are then considered political travelers for that trip. That determination should be made on a case by case basis for political trips.

The above analysis also applies to those who travel with the First Lady.

Please let me know if you are interested in attending the Senate Judiciary Committee's confirmation hearing on Wednesday at 2 PM on the hill. I am arranging car service for Brad and myself and I wanted to see if anyone else was interested in going over there with us. The hearing shouldn't last much more than an hour. Please let me know when you get a chance so that I can get a head count. Thank you.

Below is a Novak column from this weekend. [I did not cc the Judge or Tim on this e-mail, although they know about the Novak column.]

NOVAK
President Bush's aides are telling worried conservatives that moderate
White House counsel
Alberto Gonzales will not be Bush's first or second selection for the Supreme Court, though he may end up there after two new justices have been seated.

Gonzales, who resigned from the Texas Supreme Court to come to Washington, has been widely reported as Bush's likely first high court nomination. He has no hard conservative views sure to ignite a confirmation battle, and Democratic senators would be loath to reject the first Hispanic named to the U.S. Supreme Court. He served as then-Gov.
Bush's chief counsel in Texas before being appointed to the state court.

Privately, Gonzales won't hint where he stands on contentious issues. That might ease his confirmation, but it plants fears among conservatives that Gonzales will be ''another
Souter.'' As the senior George Bush's first Supreme Court nomination, Souter shrouded his views during confirmation, but he has become the Supreme Court's most consistent liberal.

Subject: Schumer Hearing July 17

Friends:
Senator Schumer's staff has informed me that he plans to hold another Subcommittee hearing:
Topic -- The Role of Real World Experience in Judicial Selection
Date -- Tuesday, July 17, 2001
Time -- 10:00 a.m.
Dem Witnesses: Hon. Walter Dellinger, former Acting Solicitor General of the U.S.

Prof. Duncan Kennedy, Harvard Law School
Professor Sheldon Goldman, Univ. of Mass. --
Poly Sci Dept.
Issues: The hearing takes its theme from the attached Linda Greenhouse article in the New York Times which supports liberals/moderates who will rule in accordance with "real life" experience as opposed to technocrats who stick to the technicalities of the law.
They want a nominee who has represented real people -- Ruth Bader Ginsburg - ACLU - who wants to help racial minorities -- or has real experience -- Stephen Breyer - chief counsel of judiciary committee who defers to congressional findings -- or has served as a politician like Earl Warren and Hugo Black.
Schumer's staff says this hearing will be bi-partisan.
It seems that Clarence Thomas might have had a real life experience or two. And Scalia's stint as AAG for OLC or Ford perhaps gave him a vantage point of the Independent Counsel law that others, save Rehnhquist, lacked.
In any event, I will be searching for witnesses and would appreciate your input and suggestions. I have contacted Frank Keating's people. [Perhaps we could bring as a special guest, but not as a witness, Detective Patrick Boyle from Philadelphia who had the real life experience of having a son shot and killed by a convict released from prison by an activist Carter appointee.]
I will be distributing the usual Sessions briefing books later this week.

DATELINE: WASHINGTON BODY:
THERE is a paradox that the recent Supreme Court term the term that saw the court decide a presidential election -- cast into high relief: rarely has the Supreme Court been as deeply embroiled in the political life of the country and rarely, if ever, have the justices themselves been so removed from the craft of politics.
From its earliest days, the court included members of Congress, cabinet officers and others drawn from the front ranks of public life. Consider that 80 years ago, a former president, William Howard Taft, began a tenure as chief justice. But though Justice Sandra Day O'Connor is a former state legislator, no current justice has held elective federal office or even a high appointed one.
Conversely, prior judicial experience was long considered irrelevant for service on the Supreme Court. For example, the early Warren Court included three former senators, two former attorneys general and Earl Warren himself, three-time governor of California and the Republican's vice presidential nominee in 1948. But all the current justices were judges when appointed, except Chief Justice William H. Rehnquist, who was an assistant attorney general in the Nixon administration.
The result has been to transform the court from an institution that once drew on the collective experience of people who had lived both sides of the vital intersection of law and politics -- where the most important cases arise -- to one staffed by a smart, highly professional cadre of academic judges who often appear disconnected from the practical implications of the court's work.
Something has been gained, certainly: a fluidity with legal doctrine in its many nuances. But something vital has been lost -- a framework for seeing the world in all its gritty reality from inside the marble cocoon.
It is hard to imagine, for example, that justices with substantial political experience would blithely assume that defending against the Paula Corbin Jones sexual harassment suit would not be a burden for Bill Clinton.

What is the current court missing without political biographies? Some justices today see Congress as alien if not enemy territory. A former member of Congress could be a useful translator of the Congressional mind, much as Justice O'Connor, who served in the Arizona State Senate, has been for the states' interests.

To cite an example from the term just over, justices with political experience might not have declared, as the majority did in a decision limiting the states' exposure to suits under the Americans With Disabilities Act, that despite holding 12 hearings over three years Congress had failed to prove state governments had a history of discriminating against people with disabilities.

The absence of any retirement announcements as the court recessed Thursday means the bitter ideological debate certain to surround President Bush's effortto fill the next vacancy is some months or years away. So it is a good time to step back and consider the court from the perspective not of ideology but biography.

From any angle, this is a far different court from the one filled by the politicians of a generation ago, whose judicial horizons stretched as far as those of the postwar country itself. The leading members of the Warren Court were "larger than life," said Lucas A. Powe Jr., a law professor at the University of Texas and the author of the recent book, "The Warren Court and American Politics" (Belknap, 2000), and they regarded the court as a canvas on which to paint on a grand scale. Not only Warren but William O. Douglas, a key member of President Franklin D. Roosevelt's brain trust and the head of his Securities and Exchange Commission, and Hugo L. Black, the Senate floor manager for much of the New Deal, had been considered as potential presidential candidates. "It mattered a lot that these were savvy politicians," Professor Powe said.

Professor Powe said that while the Warren Court is often characterized as having been "counter-majoritarian," forcing on a reluctant public its own vision of what was right but unachievable through democratic politics, this is a misunderstanding. "It was actually very majoritarian," he said. "They removed the blocks to majority rule that were lurking within the system," like the malapportioned legislatures that fell to the Warren Court's one-person, one-vote decisions. "They knew what was majority sentiment and what wasn't."

But indisputably, the Warren era provoked a strong reaction. "The technocrats we've acquired since then are somewhat a reaction to what the Warren Court did, and to the feeling that if we can just pick very safe people, they won't do it," Professor Powe said.

THERE are more generous ways to characterize the current justices than as technocrats. No one could doubt their intelligence or legal skills. "The Warren Court needed legal craftsmen and the present court is far more adept at legal craftsmanship," said Walter E. Dellinger, a law professor now in private practice who served as acting solicitor general during the Clinton administration. He was one of several advisers who urged President Clinton to resurrect the tradition of picking justices from public life. The president did consider Mario M. Cuomo, the former New York governor; George J. Mitchell, the former Senate majority leader; and Bruce Babbitt, a former Arizona governor then in the cabinet, for the vacancies that went to Ruth Bader Ginsburg and Stephen Breyer.

"I said when Thurgood Marshall retired that the court had lost its only -- Mr. Dellinger said, "and people expected me to say 'black justice.' But what I said was 'national figure.' The present court could use one, someone with real-life experience."

Justice Lewis F. Powell Jr., who had headed the Richmond, Va., school board during the tense years of desegregation, was one example Mr. Dellinger cited.

"Powell had a real sense of the way the world works," he said. "The court needs a mix of pragmatists and of those moved by abstract principle. The biggest mistake a president can make is to name the same kind of person over and over."

Diversity in the broadest sense is a goal often cited by those who study the court. "It was great to have one Bill Douglas on the court, but you wouldn't want nine of them," said Dennis J. Hutchinson, a law professor at the University of Chicago and a former law clerk to both Justice Douglas and Justice Byron R. White. Justice Douglas's "mercurial intelligence was better suited to starting an argument," Mr. Hutchinson said, "than to doing the tough day-to-day work of the institution."

Having veterans of high elective office on the court, he said in an interview, "would give texture to what are otherwise some rather flat and sterile academic debates" over questions like what use to make of legislative history in interpreting statutes. A former legislator "could bring a perspective on what often looks to the court like the irrational nature of legislation," Mr. Hutchinson said.
Justices with broad previous experience have often emerged as influential members of the court. Consider the great chief justice John Marshall, who served in Congress and was secretary of state under John Adams; and Charles Evans Hughes, who twice moved from electoral politics to the court. He was a two-term governor of New York when he was named to the court in 1910, left to run for president on the Republican ticket and rejoined as chief justice in 1930.
The effect of a skilled politician on the court can be powerful. Brown v.Board of Education had originally been argued in 1953, but the justices were deeply divided and could not coalesce around a decision. The case was scheduled for a second argument just as Earl Warren was named chief justice. The former governor was able to draw on his arsenal of political skills, largely reframing the argument so that other justices would agree on it, until he achieved unanimity for the decision.
PEOPLE who say the court is seriously out of touch with the real world invariably cite Clinton v. Jones, the 1997 decision in which all nine justices rejected President Clinton's request for temporary immunity from the Paula Jones lawsuit. The justices' confidence that the case could be easily managed by a sitting president now seems cavalier, even ludicrous. Even those who see it as legally correct -- and many do -- think that justices with government experience would have been less dismissive of the president's concerns.
On the other hand, times have changed in the law as in the country, and real-world experience may not be the talisman it once was. "The law has gotten so complicated that it's a more theoretical and complex job than it used to be," Mr. Hutchinson said.
Inevitably, any justice is the product of past experience, which may reveal itself in surprising ways. Before he joined the court in 1962, Byron White worked in Robert F. Kennedy's Justice Department as deputy attorney general, and he went to Alabama to deploy federal marshals to protect the Freedom Riders. It proved a formative experience for the crusty conservative, who in his 31 years on the court was never to forsake his commitment to civil rights nor his view that a strong national government was essential, positions struggling to hold their own on the current court. Justice White dissented from both Miranda v. Arizona and Roe v. Wade, but on federal authority he was with the liberals, Mr. Dellinger noted: "When he thought of states' rights, he saw George Wallace in the schoolhouse door."

If I'm not mistaken, 2:00 p.m. tomorrow is the time for our prep session with the nominees. If this is a separate meeting, some folks may not be able to participate, including me.

I am not intimately familiar with the terms of the current legislation on class-actions and whether it incorporates the two points you mention. But I will look into it, and if it does not, I'll recommend the provisions you sugget.

Subject: Tort Reform

A quick follow up to staff meeting. From my experience, one critical issue in class action tort reform would be to ensure that (i) the damages claims of the plaintiffs in a class action can be "aggregated" to satisfy the $75,000 amount in controversy requirement for diversity jurisdiction [under current law, an individual plaintiff's claim must surmount $75,000] and (ii) a claim for injunctive relief that would cost the defendant more than $75,000 to comply with also satisfies the $75,000 amount in controversy requirement [under current law, the value of injunctive relief is assessed from each individual plaintiff's point of view, thus rarely satisfying the amount in controversy requirement]. These are, as I understand it, the two critical legal issues for trying to prevent the kind of gross state court class action abuse that commonly occurs now.

Dana Milbank
Washington Post

Our protagonist departed the White House near unto 9:20 this morning, bound for the Capitol in a determined effort to find Gary Condit. Actually, he was to meet with the House Republican caucus. Your pool watched as POTUS descended into the bowels of the Capitol's west side accompanied by Speaker Hastert at 9:30. "We're going to talk about a lot of things," the president informed the pool. "We're going to get a lot of things done for America." The president and the caucus got so many things done for America so quickly that the hour-long meeting lasted only 45 minutes: a 25 minute speech by the president and 20 minutes of schmoozing. No Q&A with members.

Here, according to Lawrence A. Fleischer, is what occurred behind closed doors. The president told the members he would "focus on the American people" and informed them about "how optimistic he is" and reminded them that "we're doing incredibly positive things for America." Fleischer disclosed that our subject viewed the tax cut as "timely and necessary" and he thanked the members for passing the supplemental appropriation, which "shows the American people we can address shortfalls without loading up spending bills." He praised the GOP members as "good stewards of the people's money." On patients' rights, he said, controversially, that he favors a bill that "honors patients." "We're 90 percent there," quoth he. "I'm here to ask you to continue to work so I can be given a bill that I can sign." Bush praised the Fletcher bill as a "good compromise," which drew applause from most but not all members.

The big news of the day was made when our protagonist spoke about education. He declared that education is "a passion for me." In addition to this startling revelation, he made a case for free trade and his faith-based initiative. "I saw it work its magic," he told the members of his faith plan. Fleischer said Bush was advised the House may act on the patients and faith bills "as soon as next week." Bush reiterated his urging that education legislation conferees "need to go to conference."

Our hero worked a rope line in the rotunda of about 150 tourists, many with cameras and in shorts. He was accompanied by Card, Calio, Bolten and Fleischer. He emerged to applause in the sunny atrium, shaking Hastert's hand at the entrance and then spending a few minutes shaking hands and signing autographs on the rope line. Nothing audible. He gave a glance at the penned-in pool and left the scene.

July 10, 2001

Dr. John J. DiIulio, Jr.
Director, White House Office of Faith Based and Community Initiatives
The White House
Washington, D.C. 20502

Dear Dr. DiIulio:

We are deeply concerned about today's press reports that the Bush Administration may have agreed to issue an administrative legal action cutting back on the employment rights of minorities, including gays and lesbians, in exchange for obtaining the Salvation Army's political support for H.R. 7.

As a result, we request the White House provide us with the following information:

1. An itemization of all groups and persons that representatives of the Bush Administration have met with regarding charitable choice legislation, including representatives of the Salvation Army, along with the dates and a description of the substance and discussions of each meeting. Please include the names and titles of the Bush Administration representatives who participated in these meetings.

2. A description of any actual or potential promises or commitments the Administration or any representative within the Administration may have made to any groups or person in exchange for their support of charitable choice legislation or provisions permitting discrimination in employment.

3. A copy of any and all drafts of a reported administrative legal action or other regulation which would protect charities from state and local efforts to prevent discrimination against gays and lesbians in hiring and domestic-partner benefits, along with any legal memorandum or other material concerning such a possible action.

In addition, we would also like a copy of any and all communications within the White House or Executive Office of the President concerning charitable choice legislation or in connection with the above-listed meetings, promises or commitments and administrative legal action, including notes, e-mails, documents, memoranda, phone records and any other types of written, audio or electronic communication.

We also request that the White House urge the House Leadership to defer floor consideration of charitable choice legislation until we are in full receipt of the above information.

We recognize how important charitable choice legislation is to you personally and to the Administration. We also believe that religious organizations can and should have a strong and active role in dealing with our nation's social ills. However, we have long been concerned that proposals such as H.R. 7 are merely tools to permit increased discrimination and which would inappropriately entangle religion in our political affairs. This is why H.R. 7 is so strongly opposed by civil rights groups such as the NAACP and the Leadership Conference on Civil Rights.

As Members with a long time interest in civil rights matters, we would never want to see a bill purportedly designed to strengthen religion be used as an excuse to weaken our civil rights laws. It would be more objectionable yet if as part of the process of pushing this legislation, additional civil rights safeguards were forfeited in a "back room deal" outside of public scrutiny.

We are sure that the White House is as interested as we are in providing a prompt and full accounting and response to today's press accounts of a potential quid pro quo. As a result, we look forward to hearing from you by the end of this week so that we can discuss the best means of disseminating the information. If you have any questions regarding this letter, please contact Mr. Conyers' Judiciary Committee staff at 225-6906.

Sincerely,
